JOURNEY OF YOUTH

By GWENDOLINE PITKIN

As Moira turned into the drive that led to Wilburn Abbey, her mind went back to the first time she had ever visited it. Then, every nerve had been strung to breaking point; the ordeal of meeting Stephen's mother had seemed greater than any other she had ever been called upon to face, so that she said, pleadingly: "I can't go on, Stephen. I know your mother will hate me; accuse me of stealing you—stealing your youth."

And with characteristic impetuosity Stephen had answered: "You don't know mother. As for the reference to my youth," he paused a second, and looked at Moira reproachfully: "I thought you promised never to mention that nonsense again."

"I know; but, somehow, the very thought of your mother makes me so terribly conscious of my age, Stephen. Thirty-two—ten years your senior. Nothing can alter that fact."

Stephen Winters' bronze face glowed suddenly. There was a frankness, a vibrant quality about him that made him irresistible. He was so sure of himself; so confident that life would remain precisely as it was at that moment.

Moira regarded him intently. Behind her happiness the shadow of the disparity in their ages loomed fearfully. She could not forget it in that second. Hers was not that possessive, aggressive affection of the older woman who, having secured youth, refuses to let it go: it was the abiding love of a woman who had suffered disillusionment in her first marriage and, after divorcing her husband, refused to believe that life was devoid of beauty or fidelity. Since that time Stephen had been her constant companion. And for three years she had known peace and a great happiness. Nevertheless, she had refused to marry him five times before she finally agreed.

Tonight their engagement was being officially announced: there was to be a party at Wilburn Abbey. As Moira saw the long avenue of pine trees which led to the old Georgian mansion, she felt suddenly calm; as though the dignity of the surroundings gave her a fresh courage. Stephen's hand closed over hers for a fraction of a second after the car came to a standstill.

"You look beautiful," he said reassuringly. "And I happen to love you, Moira Nash. Don't forget that."

"I won't," she answered gratefully and went towards the massive entrance porch with a new confidence.

Mrs. Winters was in the hall to greet them. She took Moira's hands in hers with gentle affection.

"And this is Moira," she said, and the infection of her voice suggested a compliment. "I hope you will love it here," she added.

"Oh, I shall," Moira whispered, a load lifted suddenly from her shoulders. Her past fears vanished like a mist before the sun. What did age matter after all! What did anything matter when one was in love?

Then, from a far doorway, a young girl suddenly appeared. She came forward without self-consciousness. There was a glow of friendliness on her face as she looked at Moira and said, gaily: "I know you without any introduction. I'm Angela Marshall. I've heard Stephen talk of you so much." With a gesture of confidence Angela turned to Stephen, gave him her hands and said easily: "You've neglected your friends disgustingly lately; but you're forgiven."

In some inexplicable way, Moira's happiness was dampened suddenly. She was aware of feeling slightly outside this warm, intimate circle. It wasn't jealousy; it was the consciousness of time. She studied the girl who was still talking animatedly. Angela was barely twenty and there was that radiance about her reminiscent of an April day—a frankness that seldom went with maturity. Beside her, Moira felt an old woman.

Mrs. Winters showed Moira to her room: it was a gesture calculated to make her feel at home—one of the family.

Moira said suddenly, impulsively, as she thanked her: "I've dreaded meeting you."

"My dear!" Mrs. Winters showed consternation.

"I mean it. I expected you to be hatefully polite—to make me feel that you hated me."

"Why should I hate you? The voice was tender.

"I'm much older than Stephen,"

THE NEW "SPECIAL DE LUXE"
FORD V-8

The constant purpose of the Ford Motor Company is to improve its product and pass those improvements along to purchasers in the form of increased value.

Latest proof of Ford value is the "Special de Luxe" V-8. Many of its appointments are newly designed. Others are added for the first time. So luxury keeps pace with performance.

Outside, there are double windshield wipers, gleaming chrome bands around the hub caps, and a graceful greyhound poised on the radiator. Three smart new colours are available—Stonington Grey, Armory Green and Light Fast Maroon—with new, special 3-line striping.

Inside, the upholstery has been richly re-styled and piped with satin cord. Instrument panel and window moldings are finished in satiny walnut grain, with harmonizing hardware. Additions include: high-quality carpet in the front compartment, 30-hour clock in the rear-view mirror, sturdy lock on the glove compartment, handy extension lever on the emergency brake, and a handsome, modern steering wheel. There are new twin horns, too, like those on the Lincoln-Zephyr.

This new beauty, plus the greater gasoline mileage provided by a new improved carburetor, gives you more for your money than ever before.

See the "Special de Luxe" V-8 at your Ford dealer's. You'll like it. And so will your budget!

Stallion Owners—Attention

Under the provisions of the new Act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Inspection and Enrolment of Stallions" all stallions in the Province of Prince Edward Island both Pure-bred and Grade must be inspected and graded accordingly. No stallion will be permitted to stand or travel for service during the season of 1937 unless he has undergone inspection and receives an enrolment certificate from the Department of Agriculture. Stallion owners who have not enrolled for the season of 1936 in the records of the Department of Agriculture are hereby notified to do so, as inspection for the year 1937 will take place during the latter part of August of this year.

Owners are asked not to neglect this provision. The Act provides heavy penalties in cases of horses operating without inspection and enrolment.
