Robertson Memorial Lecture Delivered Here Last Night

Professing his belief in "the greatness of little things and little places," Mr. Leonard W. Brockington, Q.C., delivering the annual Samuel Robertson Memorial Lecture at Prince of Wales College last night said, "I can think of no fitter place for communion with the great minds of the past, for the quiet enjoyment of literature... for the search for truth in the physical world, for calm reverence and faith in matters of the spirit, for freedom from the stupidity, which is dead to the substance, and vulgarity, which is dead to form, than this little College in this little island."

REMINDS ISLANDERS

While admitting that Islanders had "some justification" for thinking that the Continent is part of the Island, Mr. Brockington expressed the hope that, although united with the rest of their fellow citizens of Canada, they would "never forget that the little things are the great things, little homes are the great homes, and little Islands can still be the great places."

HONOR GREAT TEACHER

Recalling that these lectures were established to honor "a man of whom it can be said that he gladly did he learn and gladly teach," Mr. Brockington declared that "good teachers, second only to the great apostles of religious faith, have turned the steps of mankind from dark, brutish ways to the bright horizons of civilization."
