Integrated Uniform Not Planned

By JACK PICKETTS

HALIFAX (CP)—There is no question of an integrated uniform for the armed services and any desire for one would have to come from the services themselves, Vice-Admiral H. S. Rayner, chief of the naval staff, said here.

The size of naval forces under the program of integration of the Canadian Navy, Army and Air Force, proposed two months ago in a defence department white paper, will "remain pretty much what it is now," Admiral Rayner said.

"Certainly there will be problems," he said. As Admiral Rayner saw them at a press conference here, they are those of organization and administration, "particularly administration of personnel." But these problems can be solved, he said.

The navy already had "considerable experience" with integration. Navy ships and RCAF planes in Maritime commands here and at Esquimalt, B.C. work through joint commands. The navy's basic anti-submarine role would continue.

Admiral Rayner, here on a two-day visit, said naval officers will continue to do the same kinds of jobs they do now. He saw very little change ahead for the navy's command structure.

NOT BEING CONSIDERED

A sailor would continue to be distinguishable from a soldier—unless the army agreed to dark blue uniforms. But there is "no question at this time" of an integrated uniform, said Admiral Rayner. "It is not being considered."

A prototype of an ocean-going hydrofoil ship for the navy, the culmination of many years of search, was expected to be ready for extensive trials in 1966. These probably would take place off Nova Scotia, the admiral said.

Hydrofoils are vessels that barely touch the surface of the water when travelling at high speed, cutting down friction.

Research has reached the point where hydrofoils are able theoretically to operate at high speeds on rough seas, Admiral Rayner said. "Now the only way to prove it is to build one."
