

Phrase-Coiners Point Up Growing Inflation Danger

By FORBES RHUDE
Canadian Press Business Editor
Needed: More phrase-coiners in high places.

George Humphrey, United States secretary of the Treasury, coined one recently when he said that continued big federal budgets would produce a depression that would "curl your hair."

Herbert Hoover, former U.S. president, got his biggest news play in years when he repeated the phrase and said, in effect, that unless the trend to high prices is stopped the public's hair will be curled.

The colorful phrase—whatever it means—apparently has done more to dramatize the dangers of inflation than reams of more pedestrian words have accomplished in months.

That's all to the good and need not be regarded as a reflection of undue pessimism.

For, though the post-war years have backed up the optimists, the pessimists have contributed their part.

In fact, it is often said that one reason things have been so good so long is that dangers have been foreseen and forestalled.

IKE MAY STEP IN

President Eisenhower said Tuesday that if both business and labor leaders fail to co-operate in a voluntary drive to check spiraling prices, and if inflation continues, the government would have to move in with some kind of controls.

"Some kind of controls!" Now there's a real "hair curler," because if there is anything busting and industry doesn't want, and the public probably doesn't want, it's controls.

Controls are sometimes necessary. They were used and accepted in wartime. But even before the war was over they were losing their effectiveness.

In the post-war years Canadian and American governments shed controls as fast they could and obviously don't want to use them again—beyond the controls of monetary and fiscal policy.

And, no matter how much one may disagree with the control of the current tight-money policy, it can be said for it that it is an attempt to fight inflation without resort to wider controls.

Whether it is the right policy, or is being administered in the right way, is another matter and a subject for argument.

SPOKEN IN DEFENCE

Incidentally, one of the most plainly worded defences of the tight-money policy was made recently by J. T. Bryden, vice-president and general manager of North American Life Assurance Company, to the company's annual meeting. He said:

"Demand for savings has outrun supply. There lies the real cause of our current predicament.

"Current higher interest rates are only a symptom, not a cause. They should stimulate further saving while at the same time operating to ration the demand—in a somewhat blunt fashion it is true—for available labor and materials.

"This situation will tend to correct the imbalance which now exists. Yet we find many voices decrying the increased rates, criticizing our so-called 'tight-money' as if that were the real cause of our inability to undertake all the further capital expansion we would like to do.

"We are not only trying to run beyond our physical capacity to perform but also beyond our demonstrated ability to save.

"To continue is to invite a further round of inflation—higher prices, higher costs, higher wages and a further lessening in the value of savings and quite possibly in the amount of savings too.

"To remain on a stable basis, we must discipline ourselves and equate our desires with our capacity and thus maintain a balanced progress for the ultimate benefit of all."
