BURGESS BEDTIME

He wanted to find out first who the visitor was. So now he swam under water straight over toward the dam. He can hold his breath a long time. And he can swim a long distance under water. Only two or three others, Little Joe Otter, Billy Mink and Jerry Muskrat, are as much at home under water and can stay there as long before coming up for breath. When Paddy did come up he was almost over to the dam. He came up silently, taking care not to even ripple the water. He wanted to see without being seen. This is something that is most important in the lives of Mother Nature's children. Almost at once he saw the visitor on the dam. In the dusk he seemed to be wholly black. He was shuffling along and complaining as he walked. That was all Paddy needed to know.

"Prickly Porky," thought Paddy. "I wonder what he is complaining about now. I don't know of anyone who seems to have such a good time complaining as Prickly Porky. And I don't know anyone who has less to complain about. Perhaps he does it just to hear his own voice. He is alone so much that there is seldom a chance for him to talk to anyone else and so he talks to himself. Anyway that is how it seems to me. I'm sorry for anyone who has to talk to himself."

Prickly Porky grunted and whined and shuffled along across the dam. When he got to the end of the dam, he shuffled along at the edge of the water. While he was slow there seemed to be a purpose in his movements. "He's going after lily-pads," thought Paddy. "Yes, sir, he is going after lily-pads. And that is just exactly what Prickly Porky was doing."

plete. And "in all the years" of his farming, James declares "the like never happened before." Cement was "run" busily for the foundation of our barn-to-be today. "You forgot to put in a four-leafed clover — or a horse-shoe in that cornerstone, Ellen," Mr. D. observed to us today "or a rabbit's foot — just by way of bringing you good luck!" "Guess one or the other of the first two would be easier for her to come by," James chuckled, "Ellen, never was much good at running!" Until tomorrow — — Diary — — Good-night — — now split the heavens close by with rending cracks that sounded like planks splitting. Johnny Saxon walked the floor of Irene Smith's bedroom. The tall, beautiful woman stood watching him, a tenseness in her straight figure, a look of confusion in her eyes. She was talking earnestly.

"Don't you see, I'm trying to remember? Yes... yes, it was in Greenwich Village. I recall that now. I was with Bert, and we had dinner in a little restaurant..." She paused, stared intently at Johnny. "You are so much like him..."

Johnny shook his head quickly. "No," he said firmly. "Bart was only in the book, Irene, can't you understand? You just imagined such a person. Think! The book which you were writing. What actually happened, Irene, on that Saturday night?"

He waited, as she kept staring at him. He knew that this association of ideas, connecting familiar things together, was a method used by specialists in helping amnesia victims. Sometimes it was only a single incident that mapped them out of it, a familiar song, a name, a sound...

In this case, Johnny thought, it was the tie-up between the manuscript and her real life.

She had not answered. He repeated. "It was Saturday night. You must have been down at the..."
