

Happiness Is One Long Chain Of Small Joys

"I can tell by the look on his face that he's happy about something" Alex smiled watching from a window, Mack coming by this morning. Happiness, what is it? "A happy life" someone declares, "is not built up of tears abroad, and pleasant holidays, but of little whispors from the spiritual world; little gleams of sunshine from our daily work, little clumps of violets noticed, and in the countless other small lovelinesses, folks in a pilgrim way — there happiness lies."
Or is happiness, after all, something contributed by others, to make us more or less dependent on them? Or is it some blessed element of life to be found only within ourselves? "Yes, it's a happy look!" Alex nodded. "I know this Mack was a special day: Saturday, a schoolboy's holiday, not meant however to be idle away. But given, first of all, to attend to such responsibilities as he had, to put his day from a barn-look, to open barrels of straw, to feed and bed animals, to milk a cow, not because of a nice-byond to do so, but to find a duty-job in the service."
We heard Mack in a stable: "Now, never mind rubbing your face against my sleeve, you a heifer. Eat up what I've put in your manger. ... There now, doesn't that taste good? And you are doing well on it too aren't you?" he queried, fingers exploring a depth of throat. "You Bastard, come down off that grain-bowl as fast as you can, or I'll get you not let Grand-daddy catch you at that I'll put a hand on the floor for you. Now, how do you like that? Candy, eh? Isn't it something? Alex smiled watching from a window, Mack coming by this morning. Happiness, what is it?
