Varia.
A few weeks ago there passed into the nearer presence of his God, a faithful, loving soul, the last few years of whose life on earth dwelt in a body racked by awful suffering. The story of his life tells us that the age of martyrdom has not yet passed. I shall try and compress into one or two paragraphs a short account of his vocation, his sufferings and his death.

Joseph Damien de Veuster was the son of Belgian parents. His mother was a deeply religious woman, and from her he doubtless derived the earnest character which marked him even as a youth. From his earliest childhood he felt that God had called him to serve in the sacred ministry. With his parent's full sanction he entered a Theological Seminary, and as his elder brother was about to start for the South Seas, he was attacked by fever. Damien begged to be allowed to take his place. Although his studies were not yet complete such was his earnest pleading to be allowed to go and minister to the heathen that he was ordained and immediately left for the Pacific.

In 1778 the Sandwich Islands were discovered by Capt. Cook. His estimate of their population was 400,000. Whether this was an over-estimate or not, it is at this day impossible to say, but the inhabitants now number little more than 44,000. Among the diseases which have brought about this decline, a hideous form of leprosy has been the most terrible and destructive. The Hawaiian Government, at length aroused to action, has for some years isolated the lepers on the Island of Molokai. Everyone whom it could be proved had a leprous taint was compelled to go there, and was never permitted to leave it again. Many hundreds of these unfortunate people, shut off from the rest of the world, slowly die the lingering, painful death which is the leper's.

It was to these poor dying creatures that Father Damien turned. He longed to be with them and care for their bodies and their souls. He received permission from his ecclesiastical superiors and went. He found misery and wretchedness almost passing comprehension. The water supply was bad, the houses wretched, unventilated and unclean, the people ill-fed, ill-clothed and never washed. They were all slowly dying of a loathsome disease, which left hideous marks upon the countenance, so much so that many of the poor creatures hid their faces from one another by veils; and, sad to say, in many cases the sufferers led vicious and lawless lives. In 1873 he went among them, and during his sojourn he civilized and Christianized them. He restored order and morality. He replaced despair with hope. He made life worth living for the most hopeless of God's creatures, and even taught them to be happy in some sort. When he first landed he lived under a palm tree, until by degrees, with the little help they could give him, he built a church.

And here, day by day, and many times a day, these poor people came to hear the old, old story of Bethlehem and of Calvary. Here they came, not only to worship and adore, but to take home to their very souls Him who alone is the soul's true strength. And for sixteen years Father Damien taught them and went in and out among them, praying ever for the dying, for they were all dying, and performing the last offices for the dead.

The end was only too sure. One day the visiting doctor said to him, "Father, I cannot bear to tell you, but you too are a leper." "It is no shock to me," he answered, "I knew it must come, and it is God's will." But the brave true heart never flinched. "I would not," he wrote to a friend, "be cured, if the price of my cure was that I must leave my Island and give up my poor children." His work attracted much attention in England and the Anglican Bishop of Peterboro frequently wrote to him and sent him such assistance. One clergyman in London collected £700 for him, which materially helped him in building his church. He thus wrote to a friend: "Having no doubt of the real character of my disease, I feel calm, resigned and happy among my people. Almighty God knows what is best for my sanctification, and with that conviction I say heartily, Fiat voluntas tua."

I do not know the name or the title of the Roman Catholic prelate under whose jurisdiction he was, but at the last help came to him, the kind of help he cared most for. A brother priest was sent and came to minister with him and to him, and in his turn to lay down his life as he had done. And three nuns of the Franciscan order have taken up their abode there, so that woman's gentle ministrations, sanctified by religion, may not be longer wanting to these poor outcasts.

A few weeks ago, who had attended the death-beds of 2,000 lepers, entered into rest. The Kalendar already commemorates a leper, St. Finian, but it is not recorded of him, that he, of his own free will, became a leper out of charity towards lepers. So that, in this respect, Father Damien stands alone.

In the Roman Catholic Church, canonization is a slow process. There must first be sixty years of probation, and then the strange litigation, passing through the different examinations, past the honors of the secondary apotheosis, to beatification and canonization. But, in this case, universality of Christendom will anticipate the decree, and will add Father Damien to the list of those saints, whose sainthood is the possession and delight of all true Christian souls.

After reading the account of the martyrdom of this saint of God, if any should feel how little he can do, I would ask them to PREACHING IN THE LYCEUM.—Rev. J. F. Carney will preach in the Lyceum to-morrow afternoon, at half-past two o'clock. Subject, "What I Believe." Catholics and Protestants are cordially invited. A collection will be taken at the close of the service to defray expenses.

A NICE HONEYMOON.—A young man named John Connell, belonging to St. John, N. B., who was on a honeymoon-tour with his second wife, was arrested at Toronto on Friday of last week for drunkenness. His wife said that when they were married his mother gave her $500. They started west and during the trip he abused her and got hold of the money. When confronted with his wife he didn't know her, and didn't want to know her. In short he gave her the grand shake.

Commercial Notes.

The shipment of brown freestone from the quarries at Wallace, N. S., are becoming more numerous. This kind of stone is in great demand for building purposes, and a fleet of vessels will directly take cargoes to New York, where it is in especial favor.

A new stimulus is applied to the work on the Chignecto Ship Railway. At present there are 500 men employed, and next month the number will be increased to 1500. The work is expected to be completed in September, 1890. The advantages which the enterprise will offer to Canadian ports will undoubtedly be great.

American oil has hitherto reached higher than Canadian oil, and this has been owing to the difficulty of freeing the latter from sulphur and impurities, but, if reports are true, this difficulty has been overcome, and Canadian oil will henceforth in consequence be on a par with or perhaps supplant the other, which is used so extensively in this country at the present time.

For want of rain, the streams in the region of the Upper St. John River, New Brunswick, had been dried up to a certain extent, and the lumbermen were unable to push on their work. Now, however, tidings have come that a considerable rainfall has taken place in that vicinity, and the great quantity of logs which were held fast by reason of the prolonged drought have been released by the swelling of the streams, and the lumber industry in those parts will resume its wonted activity.
