National Employment Office At Summerside Becomes Two

SUMMERSIDE BUREAU OF THE GUARDIAN The National Employment Office in Summerside becomes two offices today. Earl Cannon, manager of the National Employment Service now comes under the department of labor as one office and the second office is the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The department of labor employment service will employ 10 and the UIC seven, plus four casuals, who assist during the winter months. Mr. Cannon becomes head of the National Employment Service branch and temporarily, until someone is elected, will manage the UIC. The changes come about following a recommendation made in a Commission report two years ago. The two offices are completely separate administrations involving considerable changes. All unemployment work is to be handled by the department of labor. The UIC will receive and pay all unemployment benefits.

Statistics released by Mr. Cannon revealed, 1,781 workers, 1,346 of them males, were unemployed. This time last year the out of work labor force was 2,041, consisting of 1,383 males and 658 females. Eighty-seven jobs remain unfilled so far, as compared to 77 in 1964. It is roughly the same situation this year. There is a shortage of electricians and experienced typists, clerks and waitresses are required. Thirty orders for domestics were needed. Fourteen were placed. Although there is a shortage of farm hands, the NES placed eight. Skilled auto mechanics and electricians are in short supply.

An accountant, welder and a farmhand acquired work in the Charlottetown area while five railway workers were sent to the mainland. The majority of the 57 winter works projects in Prince County are nearly completed. Construction activity during the winter was considerably higher than usual in this area. The number of registered unemployed is 10 per cent below that of last year but in construction trades it is more than 20 per cent below.

Eight persons, five passengers and three crew members, died when the twin-engine Dart-Herald apparently blew apart a few minutes after taking off from Halifax International Airport. The plane was headed for Sydney on a flight from Moncton to St. John's, Nfld.

The wreckage was scattered over a two-mile-square area near Upper Musquodibit, about 30 miles east of the airport. Donald McLelland of Montreal, the transport department's chief accident investigation officer, said authorized searchers, including 45 Navy personnel from Shearwater naval air base near Dartmouth, N.S., were in their second day of a systematic search of the crash area. Searchers used specially prepared maps to pinpoint exact spots where parts of wreckage were found.

McLelland said use of an RCMP tracking dog was "surprisingly successful" and had helped find 18 to 20 pieces of wreckage. Sections of the plane are being taken to a hangar at Halifax International Airport. The main fuselage section however, would remain at the crash scene "until we determine the necessity" for bringing it in.

McLelland said he hoped the field investigation would be finished in two more days. Results would be announced "in due time". He said tight security is being maintained in the search area and souvenir seekers have not given any problem.
