CHAPTER I
Continued

A European, called to live between the Equator and the Tropic of Capricorn is apt to grow too stout, or possibly too lean; but safety lies in spare adipose. The friends were by nature athletic, abstemious and temperate. Both possessed abundant energy with active minds and excellent constitutions. They were tough, lean and healthy. The sun had tanned them brown, and the Northerner, who was dark, presented a clean-shorn coffee-coloured countenance, with bright grey, intelligent eyes, good forehead and fighting chin, while Aylmer's face and nether limbs were of a lighter brown and his hair, flaxen by nature, had grown a little bleached, while his sweet-heart at home, always maintained that his blue eyes had turned a paler shade under the glare of tropic sunshine.

They were a good-looking pair stretched there and clad at present in nothing but shorts, cotton vests and shabby "blazers."

Far beneath, on the roads that wound like white threads among the hills, went mounted men on horses driving herds of llamas from one grazing ground to another, or companies of foot trudging beside loaded mules; but now the unexpected happened, and a solitary rider appeared in the scrub above them, drew up his mule and lifted a thin shout that travelled to their ears.

They both jumped up to wave and yell an answer; then they climbed to join the stranger, but quickly recognized that he was none. Maine and his friend soon recognized a familiar figure, and his appearance staggered them, for of all men, Felice Pardo was the last to have been expected here.

"Good Lord! It's Felice!" cried Aylmer, and Angus admitted it. "Pardo all right. Something's happened, Tom — looks sinister if you ask me."

PARDO THE PERUVIAN

Had all been well, Felice Pardo, should now stand at the helm of their affairs at Lima, for when Tom made holiday, he took command; but he had left his post and must have been absent from it at least a week. Pardo was third in the closest possible union. He, too, was young and possessed of character. He had sprung from the people, claimed mixed blood and indeed revealed it. He was vague as to his ancestry and confessed that it admitted of considerable doubt, but he declared an English streak and believed his great grandfather to have been half an Englishman.

Felice Pardo had lived all his life in Peru and most of it at Lima. He was a year or two older than his friends, had worked at the of-ice of the Mount Atajo Silver Company for fifteen years and now, from office-boy, risen to a position of authority and trust. He lived with a widowed mother and spent most of his leisure with his two inseparable companions. He was abler than they, and had many desires and theories for the betterment of the earth. He spoke perfect English and Spanish, and he possessed a sense of humour that the others lacked, but with it there always went a sub-acid flavour, and he often puzzled them by accidental glimpses of thought and the innate bitterness bred of his convictions.

Pardo never spoke of his relations and had never asked either Tom or Angus to his home. They knew Anito Pardo, his mother, for she came to see him at the office sometimes. She, too, spoke English to them on these rare occasions, but lapsed into the vernacular when addressing her son. Signora Pardo was dark, handsome, and inscrutable; but while they sensed a being entirely hidden from their knowledge, she never failed in a courteous attitude to them and declared her son's appreciation of their friendship.

"But I do not know very much about her and have no memory of my father, who died when I was a child," he told them.

Felice's delight was photography, and he rejoiced in making moving pictures.

And now Pardo appeared, dismounted, greeted them with affection and holding Aylmer's hand declared himself the bearer of bad news. They took him to their tent half a mile distant, tethered the mule and prepared a meal.

Some Helpful Hints

use by weak fingers; long-handled Of these, about 15,000 are con-dippers; rolling pins, slicers and graters for use with one hand. Rubber suction cups are excellent to hold mixing bowls steady.

Place by the main work centres in your kitchen—stove, sink, mixing centre — the equipment and materials you use for each.

Take other short cuts. Cook many vegetables unpeeled and make one-dish meals to cut down preparation and clean-up time. Drop biscuits or cookies will save you the rolling and handling of dough that goes with most baking.

The size of a kitchen is an important factor for the handicapped. A woman working from a wheel chair needs a fairly large kitchen. A small "L" shaped kitchen is recommended for those who have trouble walking.

A handy-man around the house can think up many ways to help a disabled person in the kitchen. Revolving corner shelves, like lazy Susans, put otherwise useless corner space to excellent use and are simple to make.

Above all, don't be too fussy. Practice what the Arthritis and Rheumatism Society calls "a little intelligent neglect."

The Stars Says

your horoscope indicates that business and professional matters are on the upgrade, that prosperity should result if conservative methods are followed and if you will go out of your way to maintain the good will and cooperation of associates.

Avoid extravagances in any form and postpone new enterprises and daring ventures until early 1954, when you will enter a more propitious period. Social activities should be most stimulating throughout the fall and winter months and, except for a brief period during October when some stress may be present, domestic matters should also prosper. Postpone travel until your financial situation is on a more sturdy basis.

A child born on this day will be versatile, imaginative and dynamic in personality.

Day After Tomorrow

If you have any doubts as to what course of action to pursue, stick to customary procedures and established routines this day, since the aspects do not particularly favor the novel or the daring. If chances seem monotonous, try to exercise your skills and talents a little better than you have in the past. You should find them easier today. Community and welfare programs are under special favor during the evening hours, and if you can take part in such activities you should find them exceptionally satisfying. New friendships and romance are favored.

For the Birthday

If Monday is your birthday, you should now be entering a period which augurs well for future security. You are on the verge of endeavors and, with professional business success now within your reach, you should be able to concentrate on financial problems in your case this can best be accomplished through thrift. Extravagances and risky ventures are best for you. Instead, consolidate what gains you make in the next few months, since you may need capital to take advantage of opportunities on your horizon early in 1954.

Personal relationships should be excellent during the next six months, and there is a possibility that you may gain prestige through the judicious handling of a community problem. Domestic happiness and romance should prosper. A child born this day will be endowed with integrity, wisdom and the qualities of leadership.

with the man entirely, since seeing him, even occasionally, probably will prevent her from becoming serious over someone else.

ANSWER: Your mother is undoubtedly right. The man certainly shows no indication of ever developing serious intentions and as long as he figures in the girl's dating program at all, he's likely to occupy too large a place in her affections. I would recommend a complete break.
