

Freetown Farmers Raising Roosters

Every one else was buying pullets so we decided on roosters was the remark made by Mr. Cecil Reeves of Freetown to friends viewing the thrifty, husky three weeks old chicks owned by Mr. Reeves and his partner, Mr. Robert Jardine.

To the many farm people who are accustomed to flocks of from 100 to 300, the sight of more than 1700 cockerels all in one flock is unusual and interesting. More interesting is the fact that their home is a converted dwelling house, converted simply by opening all the doors and installing a couple of brooders. Light and some heat is supplied by electricity.

Messrs Reeves and Jardine purchased the John Campbell farm in Freetown last year, and by using a little imagination found themselves the owners of a ready-made brooder house, since they had no use for the house as living quarters. The critical early stage in the life of the chicks is pretty well passed with very small loss, and the eventual success of the project will be noted with interest in these days when farmers are wondering just which branch of live stock can be invested in, safely.
