BIG GAME 'THE NORTH.

The Wood Buffalo Nearly Extirminated—Musks, the Canadian explorer, has recently been traveling in the haunts of the wood buffalo of Canada. This buffalo is now found in small herds, the remnants of the enormous numbers that once roamed over the country north and west of the Atabasca River in the Peace and Liard River basins. Half a century ago it was no uncommon thing for a few Indians in the Peace River to go out and in a few days procure enough meat for the winter. In many years, however, no undue slaughter of the animals had occurred.

Mr. Ogilvie says that the cause of their rapid decrease in number is that one winter about twenty-five years ago a heavy fall of rain occurred, which completely saturated the snow. Then came a cold spell, and the snow was converted into an impenetrable cake of ice, and the buffaloes were nearly exterminated. The scarcity of the animals and the difficulty of getting near them does not deter white men from going into the country to hunt them. Mr. Ogilvie says he sees no reason for hunting the wood buffalo except for the sport it affords, as the paucity of their numbers and the difficulty of getting the skins out of the country preclude all idea of profit.

He described the animal as larger than the plain buffalo and darker in color. The difference in size may be accounted for by the difference in the quality of food peculiar to each, and the difference in color by the shelter from the bleaching action of the sun on the hair afforded by the woods.

The musk is also hunted in the country north of that in which the wood buffalo ranges. With the means of travel now available, it is little more than a pleasure trip to reach the home of this American of this arctic animal. It roams over what is commonly known as the Barren Lands, the treeless plain lying east of the fringes of woods along the Mackenzie River, north of the Great Slave Lake. Mr. Ogilvie was told that musk oxen had recently been found southeast of Lake Athabasca. They are frequently found within fifty miles of the Mackenzie River, north to the Arctic Ocean. A white man recently entered their grazing grounds as trophies. He is bringing back to see the region they inhabit and secure was accompanied by a large number of Eskimos, instead of helping him they proved to be a nuisance and had to be driven away with force. The party slaughtered sixty musk oxen and eighty or ninety caribou. Only a few musk ox heads were brought back to the north, which this trip made has induced others to think of striking for this region in quest of the animals for the sake of their skins, and Ogilvie says it is only a question of time when these musk oxen will be hunted extensively. He thinks the Government should issue a close season to prevent their extermination. The Northwest Council, which governs the Northwest Territory of Canada, has already an ordinance in force prohibiting the killing of wood buffalo.

A British scientific society has recently offered a considerable sum of money for the musk ox or a herd of several oxen to be delivered alive at the Zoological Gardens in London. If any party wishes to take advantage of this offer, the musk ox will come from a part of British North America in which the animals are now found, as it will probably be far easier to secure the animals and take them to the sea from this region than from any part of the arctic countries where they are found.

Charles A. Lambley, 40 years old, foreman of James J. Hill's farm near White Bear, met Ogilvie and some of his men yesterday afternoon. About 1 o'clock he left home, telling his wife he was going to Mud Lake, on the western boundary of the farm, to shoot some ducks.

Two hours later one of the farm hands, passing along the edge of the lake and looking over some of the ducks on the water, perceived a human being struggling in the boat. There was no boat near in which the farm hand could go to the assistance of the drowning man, and he hurried off to Mr. Hill's residence and spread the alarm among the other employees. When finally the ducks were shot and the boat was found floating on the surface of the water, nothing could be seen of its former occupant.

The boat was recognized as the one Lindberg was accustomed to use, and it was found within three feet of where the boat had been capsized, in about four feet of water. The bottom of the lake is an oozy mass of mud and treacherous quicksand, out of which about thousands of water lily stems. Evidently Lindberg had slipped a couple of ducks, and the birds were floating near by on the water—and in attempting to pick them up had capsized the frail boat. His feet became tangled in the stems of the water lilies, and he could not extricate himself from the quicksand, into which he was drawn under the water and drowned. The body was nearly buried in the mud when the searchers recovered it.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Dolly Madison's Ruin. Mrs. Madison was unquestionably the most popular woman that has ever presided over the social life of the executive mansion. She was extremely beautiful in person and gentlemanly in manner. Consummate tact made good her lack of liberal education. Madison first met her when he was a member of Congress at Philadelphia and with Aaron Burr, boarded at the house of her father, Mr. Payne. She was then the Widow Todd. The future President promptly fell in love with her. But having some doubts about her mental qualities, he one day handed her a book to read and asked her to give him her opinion of it. She gave the book to Burr with the request that he write a letter for her to copy. This he did with his usual readiness, and Madison on receiving the note was fully convinced that his ladylove's intellect was equal to her beauty. He had once offered himself and was accepted.

One of the most essential devotions in the pilgrimage is to drink of the water from this well, and its drink is always crowded with pilgrims, some drinking it with their hands, others dipping it up in cups and gourd and drinking it. The water used for bathing runs directly back into the well, and thus disease are directly spread.

The authorities did for a time this year close up the well, and the result was a little or none. The most complete sanitary precautions are utterly disregarded by the cholera-stricken pilgrims. No cholera is thus spread, but the holy cities are hotbeds of small-pox and other like terrible diseases. The same conditions are true of El Tor, Jeddah and Constantinople, and the Indian health officials will, for the protection of its people as well as for the sake of the country's honor, make strenuous endeavors to induce the authorities of the holy places of pilgrimage to take an interest in drainage and general sanitation of the town, and to see that their people have fewer priests. They think that the western nations might profitably take an interest in the condition of things in Arabia, and the result of their investigations will be offered in the hope that steps will be taken to crush out the cholera in what they assume to prove its real endemic home.
