ATLANTIC FLIGHTS

Cheaper Air Travel Seen Results Of Quiz

OTTAWA (CP) — An aerial quiz now in operation may mean lower fares for transatlantic flights — if travellers aren't too touchy.

The three-part "sky questionnaire," handed to passengers along with the champagne cocktails, will have a bearing on new routes, ticket prices and flight services.

The survey — described by usually reserved Ottawa statisticians as "trail-blazing" — started three months ago and will run a year or more.

Toughest question concerns income. Money and social status are so closely related, statisticians say, that the $5,000-a-year man sharing a seat with a business tycoon may be reticent about salary.

"We regard the income figures as suspect," said a survey official.

Analysis shows that Canadian travellers are "far less reluctant" than other nationals to expose salary brackets. Immigrants and foreign travellers are more wary, perhaps because of suspicion arising from a sense of strangeness.

Officials said a close look at income groups among airline clientele may help determine whether companies could attract passengers to international travel by lowering rates.

Price tags may mislead. Don't be fooled by phony "bargains". They may be discontinued lines. This means service and repairs may be costly, difficult, even impossible.
