Canadian Reaction Is Cool To Stockpiling In Europe

By DAVE McINTOSH

OTTAWA (CP) — Generally overlooked in the hullabaloo which followed Gen. Lauris Norstad's press conference remarks here Jan. 3 was a recommendation by the former NATO commander in Europe in the field of conventional weapons.

This recommendation has taken on added significance since last week's Commons defence debate during which Prime Minister Diefenbaker said more and more emphasis must be placed on conventional weapons.

Gen. Norstad said Canada in the early days of NATO committed three army brigades to the defence of western Europe. One brigade is stationed in West Germany while the other two are held in reserve in Canada.

The general said he would advocate the stockpiling in Europe of equipment for the two reserve brigades in preparation for any emergency in which these brigades would be airlifted overseas.

He said equipment for three American reserve divisions has been stockpiled in Europe and that these formations could be flown overseas in civilian as well as military aircraft and be in the line in 10 to 14 days.

REACTION COOL

Initial reaction to this proposal in the Canadian defence department was cool. The feeling was that there is some doubt that reserve brigades could be moved to Europe in time to get into action, even if their equipment was already there in advance.

However, since then, government circles have been discussing the possibility of creating an airborne brigade which could be flown quickly with all its equipment, to any trouble area.

Defence officials say there is one big drawback to such a plan: The uneconomic use of air transport.

Such an airborne brigade would require a fleet of planes which would necessarily stand idle most of the time.

NEED WORK

RCAF transport command says its crews must be given useful work and be kept busy or the command would be unable to function efficiently in an emergency when peak operation would be required.

The Glassco Royal Commission on government operations has suggested that RCAF transport command is cutting more and more into commercial airline operations and that the government should take a hard look at the situation. On overseas transport operations, the CRAF rivalled Trans - Canada Air Lines.

A government spokesman said an airborne brigade would be highly useful in any United Nations operation such as in The Congo.

Other officials dispute this on the grounds that, except for the unique case of Korea, the UN has always asked Canada for administrative and not combat troops.

The bidding:

South	West	North	East
1♥	Dble.	Redble.	1♠
2♠	4♥

Opening lead—king of spades.

The declarer is frequently forced to find the winning line of play because the logic of the situation demands it. In such hands, he must proceed on the basis that the adverse cards are divided in a specific way because, if they are not, he cannot make his contract.

Look at this hand where West leads the A-K of spades. South ruffs, of course, and there seems to be little to the play, since he can count ten tricks in hearts and diamonds.

However, a complication arises when he leads a heart to the ten and a heart back to the king and West shows out.

If South extracts East's two remaining trumps at this point, he will be unable to cash five diamond tricks, having no further entry to his hand after cashing the high diamonds in dummy.

If he delays the extraction of trumps, attempting to cash the A-K-Q of diamonds first, he runs the risk that East will ruff one of them and defeat him.

What does declarer do in such a situation? The first thing he does is make an assumption that the adverse cards are so divided that he can make the hand. To play on any other basis would be a form of defeatism.

The outcome of the hand obviously depends on the division of the diamonds. South disregards from consideration hands where East has no diamonds or only one. He cannot make the contract if either of these conditions exists.

He next turns to cases where East has two, three, four or five diamonds. In all these cases he can make the contract by proper play.

Accordingly, South stops drawing trumps and cashes the A-K of diamonds. He notes that both opponents follow suit.

Since it would be dangerous to cash the queen at this point, East might have only two diamonds and ruff the queen—South resumes drawing trumps. He cashes the A-J, being careful to discard the queen of diamonds from dummy, and thus is able to cash his remaining diamonds.
