The Riddle of the Riderless Horse
By JEAN & CYRIL CASALIS

"Shortly after the plan had been conceived that great philanthropist, Loftus, sent down a bath of a hundred down-and-outs from Johannesburg for a month's holiday in Campsie. During the day they were down-and-outs; doubtless they benefited by the change, for at night they were a band of most efficient contractors who installed not only the tank at the Campsie pump, which received the daily supplies brought from Brantford in the false-bottomed whey cart by the admirable Tom, but also the pipe-line which allowed the precious liquid to gravitate to the cave and then half-way down the passage where it was tapped into canvas water bottles.

"That gang also brought with them the mechanical apparatus by which the boat was drawn across to Basutoland, and the collapsible boat whose design was conceived by Loftus. Cornelie will remember, too, that Channing got all his farm machinery through Loftus and, unlike everybody else, received the original expert in the matter of getting the rifles for the trade in arms to Campsie.

"The storekeeper Aaron on supplied and his way of doing so was also the safest imaginable. Our daily supplies were poured by his own hands into a wooden tub which he carried on his back to his private office. A pipe led from it into the wall below, at the spot beside which you may have noticed when he was resting his horses in the hotel yard. It was a matter of only a few minutes for Tom to connect the rubber tubing attached to the rubber pipe with the tap concealed in the wall, and to reverse the process of transferring supplies when conforming to Channing's curious method of carrying his horses at the Campsie pump on his return home.

"The only other detail in the organization I have not yet explained, is the signal from Campsie to Chief Mankoto apprise him of the delivery of consignments. Will you tell me how you discovered the signal, those signals, and were thus able to keep watch at the river on the very nights on which we operated? It reads mitchel in a mob of cattle grazing on a hill, recognized as set apart for the special delimitation of half-starved Basutoland cattle.

"I didn't," interposed Malcolm. "Maraka spotted that."

"Our troubles began," the letter continued, "while Tom was carrying some of the rifles which he had chosen, at a time when all sensible people are taking a well-earned rest, to go to that one place on Campsie where you found her. Tom caught her and bound her, and for that I admit I am to blame. Had I been less squeamish and had undertaken that task, too, Miss Cynthia might conceivably have suffered less."

"Great Scott!" Cornelie interrupted. "Then Tom was Maraka's sinister Left-Hand?"

"Yes, and missing that clue was one of my worst lapses, and at the beginning before Maraka ever spoke of Left Hand, I watched Tom polishing my car and doing the whole thing with his left hand. I noticed each ring of his and he went to infinite trouble to point out that he wore it on his left hand; and yet

DECIDED TO CLOSE DOWN

"The first we knew of Japle having seen the signals, which he had described to you, was on the night on which he died when the owl's hoot warned Channing of something amiss. He turned quickly, and there, silhouetted against the sky, also in doubtling in wonder at the scene before him, sat that foolish foolish
