Cornerstone Laying Slated Sun. For New Church, Lot 65

The cornerstone- laying and solemn blessing of the newly-constructed St. Anne's Church at Tryone, Lot 65, will take place Sunday afternoon, July 14, at 3.30, with Most Rev. M.A. MacEachern, DD, bishop of Charlottetown, officiating.

Following blessing and laying of the cornerstone and blessing of the church, Solemn High Mass will be celebrated. The sermon will be delivered by Rev. L.P. Callaghan, DD, a native son of the parish, now pastor at Indian River and Kensington.

Rev. C.J. McCarthy is pastor at St. Anne's.

Construction of the new church was started in July last year, and work was completed Dec. 24, in time for mid night Christmas mass. The new edifice replaces the former church, which was destroyed by fire on Jan. 14, 1962.

The new church was designed by Alfred Hennessey, Charlottetown architect, and built by M. F. Schurman Co. Ltd. Foreman on the job was Ed Thornton.

product. When I say 40 per cent of the GNP I am obviously taking issue with those statistics which annually purport to show that agriculture accounts for but six percent of the GNP. Such narrow measurements tell us little of agriculture's real contribution to the Canadian economy. This contribution can only be seen when considered in association with all the industries that serve agriculture as their primary source product.

I suggest we stop equating Canadian agricultural economics solely with the farming element. Canadian agriculture amounts to much more today than just food and fibre from the land. It is inseparably linked with a complex of industries which reach far into the overall Canadian economy-in their impact on employment and consumer purchasing power. Despite our industrialization, agriculture remains Canada's biggest and most important enterprise.

LIKE CITY PEOPLE

Most farmers are basically little different from city people. They, too are reaching for a higher standard of living. Through business management they are achieving this objective. More and more they are accepting and adapting to the stresses and strains of competitive enterprise.

The rise of these businessmen-farmers as dominant figures in the agricultural community is the dynamic outgrowth of the rapid acceptance of farm mechanization. But the economic and technical advances in Canadian agriculture have not been accompanied by a corresponding improvement in communications.

This had led, naturally, to a lack of co-operation, understanding and a realization of mutual problems. If there is to be a co-ordinated attack on the problems in the industry there must be a clearing house of ideas to bring the best brains of our agricultural community together. Such a pooling of intelligence is necessary if Canadian agriculture is to become a truly mature element in our economy.

We cannot much longer persist in the notion that farming is a somewhat backward economic cousin, only distantly related to the over-all economy. By the same token, if agriculture is to advance with the rest of the economy, parts of our farming community must cease to cling to causes and traditions which are outmoded.

SEEN OBSTRUCTION

Such action often appears to the public—who is at once the consumer and the voter— little more than a form of obstruction to real economic progress. It also distorts in the public's mind the true significance of the agricultural issues in dispute. The end result is usually public apathy and indifference—or antagonism.

The farmer has demonstrated he is not unresponsive to progress. In many matters directly related to his farm operation he has shown his awareness of the need for up-to-date equipment, seeds and fertilizers. Canadian farmers are now investing in equipment at the rate of $200 million a year.

More and more farmers are realising they are part of the national business economy and not something remote from it. When they produce they must sell, just as a car manufacturer, tailors and oil companies.

All segments of Canadian agriculture must become consumer-oriented. Many traditional agricultural products are consumer targets for a change. Too much effort goes into resisting change instead of finding ways to take advantage of it. There is no place in today's competitive world for an industry or part of an industry which seeks to seal itself off from the main stream of events and cling to traditions that have no value in the present."

Stature Of Agriculture Stressed By Industrialist

The belief is not uncommon that with the growth of industrialization in Canada that agriculture is no longer very important.

We think there is a danger in accepting this belief and as a recent statement by an industrialist of stature sets the matter in a new perspective for both farmers and others we are quoting the article in question. This approach to a newsletter is also in deference to the holiday period in the Federation office.

D.A. Coape-Arnold is Vice-president and General Manager of Massey-Ferguson Ltd.'s North American operation. Here is what he had to say in backing up his belief that agriculture is not the economy's backward cousin. It is Canada's biggest and most important enterprise and more people should recognize this fact.

The following material is reproduced from the Financial Post.

DISCORDANT MIXTURE

"The voice of Canadian agriculture is too often a discordant mixture of voices in which it is hard to make out the words, much less draw from them many meaningful and worthwhile conclusions.

The average Canadian, therefore, knows more about the perils of outer space than the problems of our agricultural community; more about astronauts than agrologists. This is a sad commentary on an industry that provides 35 per cent of the jobs in Canada and accounts for 40 percent of the gross national
