will accompany him.

VERY OLD MAN.—James Ross, of East St. Martin's, N. B., is 107 years of age. He was born in the county, Inverness, Scotland, and was 25 years old when "Waterloo was fought and won." In the early seventies he immigrated to Pictou, N. S., and later went to St. Martins, where he has ever since resided. This aged Scotchman, though nearly five score years and ten, is yet strong and free from aches or pains; rheumatic twinges are unknown to him. He goes out daily, and last summer mowed a field of grass near his home.
Strange, this man who has lived a century and more, has never seen a railway train!
He has used the pipe since boyhood, and to-day the pipe is his greatest luxury.

THE DRAMA.—Realism on the stage is getting to be one of the important features in successful dramatic productions of the day, and it would seem the limit had been reached for novelty in that line. The latest hit of realistic production, and one which is even more sensational and striking than any yet seen, is the introduction of the Carlton Iron Work, the largest iron mill in the world, in full blast. A realistic scenic representation is given of the vast furnace, the stage being darkened, and the effect is weirdly picturesque. From the tall chimneys, volumes of dense smoke pour forth with a roar, and when the big doors of the furnace are opened the fiery flames shoot out with dazzling brilliancy —huge sheets of bluish, gas-ou fire which lights up the faces of the workmen and forms a realistic scene. Independent of this, there are other beautiful scenes introduced in "Master and Man," which will be at the Opera House for one night as the opening bill for the Josie Mills Dramatic Company, who will commence their week's engagement at the Opera House on Monday next.

A MEMORABLE SEA VOYAGE.

Very Queer Method of Transporting a Murderer.

From Sydney comes curious details of the sea voyage of murderer Butler, who killed a half dozen men whom he induced to go with him to find mines in the Blue mountains of New South Wales, and who was caught at San Francisco after a trip across the Pacific as foremast hand on the barque Swashilda. Three Australian detectives had him in charge, and he was placed in an iron cage on the lower deck of the steamer, wearing leg irons that were riveted to the floor.

For two days he refused to eat, and had violent fits of rage in which he threatened to kill his guards, but when menaced with the straight jacket he became calmer.
During the stay of the steamer at Auckland the murderer was permitted to hold a levee in his cage. Visitors of both sexes brought him liquor, cigars, and flowers, and shouts and laughter came from the neighborhood of the cage as Butler entertained his callers with amusing stories. A writer described the scene as follows:

"One could scarcely believe that the scene was real—this man accused of many foul crimes, chained by a leg to a ring in the floor like a wild beast in a menagerie, lolling on a low bunk, dressed in pajamas, smoking cigars, and nipping whiskey talking and laughing and joking about the crimes. It was very foreign to the strictness and sternness of British methods of treating those in custody."

Butler bragged when he was in San Francisco that he had money in England and Australia, but he declared when he got to Sydney he was penniless, and counsel was furnished him. The attorney-general was much disgusted over the sensational accounts of Butler's crimes which the Sydney newspapers printed upon the prisoner's arrival, and warned them not to comment further on the case. The newspapers refused, and were fined $7.50 each. Butler was promptly identified and placed in Darlinghurst gaol.

A SHIPPER'S MISTAKE.

We've just opened a handsome line of Frilled Muslin Curtains and Curtain Muslins, plain and fancy, white and colored, the very latest novelties. By mistake these were shipped too late so we'll clear them at 25 per cent. discount.
