CHAPTER TWELVE
Part One

"I'm sure he does." Cliff's voice was weary but patient, "but he loves Janet."

"I don't believe it!" Her tone was brittle with exasperation. "I'm going in there, anyway."

"Listen here, Naomi, I'm not going to stand for any nonsense from you. We've all been under a strain and you're not helping the situation."

"You talk to me as if I were a child!"

"Because you're acting like one, infant."

"Well, you can't get away with it—Richard needs me. Get out of my way, Cliff!" Her voice soared shrilly. "You have no right to keep me from him!"

Janet heard a brief scuffle, a startled protest from Naomi, followed by a series of resounding slaps.

"Cliff Bronson! How dare you!" "That's only a sample, Miss Farquhar. Now go upstairs to bed and get some sleep—I hate to admit it, but we'll need you around tomorrow."

There was no rejoinder. Janet tiptoed to the door Naomi had gone and Cliff was sitting on the edge of the leather sofa, smoking and chuckling.

"Cliff, what happened?" "I spanked her—hard."

"Oh, Cliff, you'll get in trouble with Dr. Farquhar."

"I don't think so. Naomi is the type that admires caveman tactics. She has a lot of spunk herself."

He sounded as though he had made a minor discovery. They were snowbound all the next day. The storm had ceased and the sun glittered brilliantly on the soft layer of fresh snow, but the road crews and linesmen were still busy nearer to the city limits.

At two o'clock Cliff appeared suddenly bundled to the ears in his overcoat and muffler, behind him Naomi was huddled in her soft furs.

"We're going out to the highway," he explained. "I may be able to contact a power line crew and put a call in to the hospital. Keep your Richard warm and give him those sedatives if he's uncomfortable." He prodded Naomi in the back. "Come along, Baby."

She walked ahead of him docilely and Cliff looked back, shot Janet a wide, triumphant grin and winked.

When she heard the front door close, she leaned back in the big wing chair beside Richard's bed and closed her eyes. The house was very still.

Slowly she became aware, as often happens, of eyes fixed upon her and she opened her own to find Richard staring at her. His pupils were dilated from the effect of pain killing drug which made his gaze look dark and intense.

"Richard—"

His mouth twisted in its old lopsided grin. "I really fixed things up, didn't I?" he said.

"You couldn't help it—evidently there's no predicting what that William Hartigan will do."

"He stumbled, you know," he said slowly.

"Yes, it was accidental, but someone like William should never have a gun. I'd like to know how he got hold of it."

"I'm sorry it happened, in many ways. Cliff will have to inform the police—you have to report all gunshot wounds, you know."

Janet noticed with a little thrill of surprise that he was using Cliff's first name now instead of calling him Bronson, and Cliff in turn was referring to him as Richard.

"How do you feel?"

"Not too bad . . ." he paused, seeming to be assembling his words. "I guess Windell and I were wrong about Cliff—he seems to have all the makings of a good surgeon. That was a pretty fine thing he did, Janet."

She was slightly puzzled. "Yes, it was, Richard, but he didn't have much choice—all the roads were blocked, we couldn't get you to town."
