ELLEN'S DIARY

Wednesday, Mack Recalls Is A Big Day At The Fair

"Wednesday," Mack remembers this morning, "is always a big day at the Fair."

His first chores done, including the milking of the house-cow, he had come by when the folks at this house were breakfasting. Doors were open to the new day, to access of mid-summer over the fields; to a light wind stirring, and old birds on the wing, though at the time a mist was draped on the hills.

Bowls of porridge, we were enjoying and awaiting, the pleasure were dishes of poached eggs on toast, and our customary cups of tea. A jar of last Autumn's jelly, made from crab-apples gathered in the old orchards whose forecasting a spell of mildness, the bluejays visit in winter, taught a pretty spot of color to our meal, and provided a sweet touch for palates as well.

James nodded, "Wednesday and Thursday, once drew the biggest crowds. To the old-time Exhibition, that was. Before folks had cars — when from around these parts, and over distances, they came to it by horse and wagon. We was silent a moment, as he would appreciate looking back through the years of days far past. Then, unless a farmer was showing stock, they drove to town, left your horse at a lively stable, and walked out to the grounds."

"In plenty of company," we said. "A long walk," Mack observed.

"Tut, tut, child! It was only step!" James smiled. "You could've been looking in the past, 'drive out in a tax double-seated wagon, that was. If you felt you could spare the quarter, his fare. If you were an exhibitor of stock you were privileged to take your horse and wagon on the grounds. You unblest him in a double-seated wagon!"
