TORONTO, Nov. 21 — (CP) — The annual board meeting of the Federated Women's Institutes of Ontario yesterday heard a report that 36 new branches were organized this year, raising the total number of branches to 1,463. Mrs. J. Cooper of Fort William, provincial convener for citizenship and education, said greater emphasis this year was placed on citizenship.

She said programs were planned first around the needs of each community and extended to a study of constitutional government and the declaration of human rights. Mrs. J.R. Fletcher of St. Thomas, retiring president, gave a resume of the year's work. She reported branches raised about $24,000, quilts and clothing for Manitoba flood victims.

Last Sunday afternoon, the senior basketball team gave the students a sample of what they may expect in the Island League, when they defeated a hastily banded together team from the City by a 70-40 score. It ought to be mentioned that their opponents were handicapped considerably by their lack of practice and substitutes. This afternoon, the Saints will play Prince of Wales in an exhibition game, which will be played in the P.W.C. auditorium. It will be the means of determining the quality of basketball that fans may look forward to this season.

This evening will be a big one for high school. These students will be out to show the whole college that their dramatic ability takes no back seat to that presented for there will take place this evening the presentation of the High School Drama Festival. Competing for the High School championship will be one-act plays from Grade X and Commercial, Grade XI, and Grade XII. As was the case for College years, this activity is under the auspices of the St. Dunstan's Dramatic Society.

And that reminds us to pay just and due tribute to Edwin "Call Me Aristotle" MacDonald, who is the third "great man" to deserve a word of praise for his assistance in helping make the stage ready for the activities of the Dramatic Society.

The M.I.D.L. trial debate of the week featured the topic: Resolved, that compulsory military training should be adopted in Canada. Speaking for the affirmative were John Mulhally and Fred Driscoll; for the negative, Regis Duffy and Robert Croken. In connection with these M.I.D.L. debates, it is not in the least an exaggeration to add that they are becoming one of the most important features of our college week.

Under the inspiring leadership of President Kay Roche, the Sigma Delta Sorority is really "going places" this year. Recently, members of this all-Canadian organization decided to arrange for the presentation of a series of lectures on cultural topics. They were most fortunate to have the first of these lectures delivered by Sister Saint Margaret of Paray, C.N.D., Superior of Notre Dame Academy, who, calling upon her long and successful experience in a ladies' college, gave a most interesting, illuminating, and much appreciated talk. Through this column, our coeds publicly express their very sincere thanks to Sister for her most inspiring lecture.

In the realm of entertainment too, the coeds are doing their full share. On Thursday night, they, with the cooperation of the Benevolent Irish Society, sponsored a most highly successful college dance in Whelan Memorial Auditorium. Keep it up, girls!

Until next week: From S.D.U. to all of you, health and happiness.

THE WEEK at S.D.U.

During the week a number of students had occasion to get together in discussion on their responsibilities to St. Dunstan's. After considerable discussion it was unanimously agreed that all owe a great deal to our college, more, perhaps, than we shall ever be able to repay. It was agreed also that it was imperative that we be conscious of our obligations at all times. After arriving at these definite conclusions, the matter was left to the consideration of a committee made up of the class presidents, and one other representative of each class and of high school.

This column is in a position to say that the meeting of this committee was one of the most intelligent and enthusiastic in which most of the members ever took part. Here, as at the general meeting, there was considerable discussion, and in this respect, it is important to realize that all members were eager to take part in it. The meeting decided that a committee, or better still, an organization, dedicated to the best interests of our college both on and off the campus, would in no wise be out of place on the campus.

Yet, because the members seemed to be eager for some definite plan in an idealistic sort of way, there was some hesitation. That was a good sign, because it is too often true that fools do rush in where angels fear to tread. But it did not deter the group. What was wrong, they concluded, with wanting to do the best they could for St. Dunstan's? So it was resolved that this committee would attempt at all times to impress upon the students of St. Dunstan's their obligation to promote the best interests of our college.

Those who have seen the idea through thus far are counting on the cooperation of every student, so that the ideal may be carried out to the fullest. However, so that no one will misunderstand, it should be insisted that we think St. Dunstan's a pretty fine place just as it is. We are not so naive, however, to believe that everything is perfect, or that we are conscious of promoting the best interests of the college at all times. It is a pity that nothing more we can do to show our appreciation for S.D.U. It is the opinion of this column, and it does not stand alone, that this committee will be responsible for adding even greater lustre to the name of "Old St. Dunstan's."

Although the hockey team has had its second practice of the season, basketball is still the top athletic activity on the campus. All seem to be in as much practice as possible in anticipation of the day when they will be showing their wares in the new gymnasium. From this week's basketball activity, we can report that the Sophomores are riding along at the top of the intramural league, trimming all comers, but not always without any trouble. And, in the juvenile league, the feature of the week was Stan Mooney's Junior team coming through with its first victory of the season, not however, without the aid of some brilliant strategy on the part of Captain Mooney.

Last Sunday afternoon, the senior basketball team gave the students a sample of what they may expect in the Island League, when they defeated a hastily banded together team from the City by a 70-40 score. It ought to be mentioned that their opponents were handicapped considerably by their lack of practice and substitutes. EL DORADO

"El Dorado" is a term which really means the unrealizable here on earth. It owes its origin to the Spaniards who sought a place where there was much gold, hence it is now a term which speaks of golden treasure or golden opportunity. That word, "opportunity" is a picture — "oh portus" — opposite the harbour. There was a time when it was uttered first and we can think of a Roman sailor coasting down the shores of Italy and seeing a good harbour, who said, "this would be a good place to land." If they drifted by the opportunity would be lost; so that the word is a picture and the coin-er was a poet.

We are always pursuing a flying flag. We never catch up to our heads. In "Old pictures in Florence" says this "What comes to perfection perishes" and works done least rapidly, Art most cherishes. Elsewhere he asks, "What act proved all its thought had been?" or "What hand and brain went ever paired?" There is always a new horizon beckoning men onward, Stevenson says "an aspiration is a joy forever." It is really a possession, a fortune which we cannot exhaust. Desire and curiosity are the two eyes through which we see the world. Some of us put our eyes in our pockets and see nothing! A modern essayist tells of a young man who had read through some of Carlyle's works and remarked as he finished, ten note

Tomorrow's Promise

By Temple Bailey

The chances were, however, that she would marry the young man. A woman was like that — propinquity and a man madly in love with her! She would mistake her need of love for love. It was no business of his, of course. That was why he had sent her away. That he might never see her again, and that she might never guess his identity. Why should he impose his past on her? Why speak the name that she would see black in the headlines if she opened the morning paper?

That was the worst of it — the papers and the things they said. This very pilgrimage of his was an escape from it all. If he could only tell her the truth! She would, he thought, understand.

But there it was again — his name and the conjecture it would arouse. And he would meet her father and mother. He wondered what the mother was like.

He was frankly sentimental on the subject of homes. He had never had one. It had seemed the irony of fate that he, whose boyhood had been lonely and at loose ends, should have linked life with that of a woman who had no talent for domesticity.

But then, men choose women for their looks. And reap the whirlwind! Or do they choose? Is it not a mad enterprise, undertaken without a thought of the hazards ahead? He rose and stood gazing up toward the dark house where light still came black in the lower windows. He wondered if he might look through the windows and see Anne. Perhaps the moonlight had given her fictitious charms which would fade in a less glamorous setting.

In a few hours he would be on his way and Anne would forget him. He looked at his watch. Two-thirty. No more sleep tonight! He put another stick on the fire and by the light of the leaping flames wrote a letter, leaving leaves from his notebook until he had a sheaf of them. He addressed an envelope, sealed it and made his way across the meadow, coming at last to the garden and the tall hedge.

He found the curtains drawn at the windows of the big house, so he could see nothing. Following a flagged path he reached the driveway, and a tall iron gate with a mail box hung on the brick wall beside it where he posted his letter. Retracing his steps he stood again on the little hill where earlier in the evening Anne had met Garry, and looked down over the sleeping garden. Its autumn fragrances came up to him — the tang of the chrysanthemums, the sweet fruity smell of drying grapes, the sharp aroma of the mint still fresh and green in a clump beside the pond, and the darkness of the pond itself, where in the brightness of the night a goldfish flashed now and then to the surface and where a great stone toad lay squat and ugly amid the floating leaves.

From the height where he stood, Charles could see straight through the window of a darkened room on the second floor of the house and beyond that the lighted hall. And as he looked a woman came within his line of vision. She was ascending the stairs. He saw her — first her and arms, then ray and shining head then the whiteness of her neck as the dawn, her pink and silver gown. She was very beautiful. With an almost startling beauty like the splendid ladies in Romney's paintings or Sir Joshua's. But her beauty left Charles cold. Such god-books on Frederick the Great, "What! Is there no more Carlyle?" So Alexander wept when there were no more worlds to conquer.

Life has many El Dorados. Art has one. Morals has none. Learning has one too. We have never heard of an artist who was wholly satisfied with his work. Years ago I boarded in a home which contained an artist, and I use the word "artist" deliberately, for he was one. A picture from his hand hung in the room in which I studied. One afternoon when I returned I saw that this particular picture was hung inside out, and on enquiring I told me that he saw a defect in it. I had noticed no such defect, for my eye was not trained as was his. But the artist could not look at it without seeing that. He had not reached his goal! "A man's reach should exceed his grasp, or what is a heaven for?" "Man has forever."

He aims at perfection because to be honest he must do that; but he knows at the same time that it is far beyond his reach.

There is the El Dorado in morals. The ideal shifts. The moral man sees it fleeing as he approaches; it is a flying thing and is very elusive.

Man is bound to seek after the best. The Greeks called it the "summun bonum." In morals, he must hitch his wagon to a star."

The El Dorado of learning sees many with bleeding feet trying to ascend the heights, and who leave as their epitaph: "They died climbing or they died learning," which latter words are on the tomb stone of John Richard Green.

When Newton said that he was like a child throwing pebbles in to the ocean making a little stir, he acknowledged that this El Dorado was not to be conquered by him. And still in all these spheres the words of Stevenson are true — "It is true that we shall never reach the goal; it is even more true that there is no such place. O toiling hands of mortals, O unweary feet, travellers, you know not whither, you think that from some hilltop soon you shall view the El Dorado. Remember the best blessedness is to travel hopefully — a better thing than to arrive, and the true success is but to labour!"

The apostles' attitude is the right one — "I follow after" — forgetting the past, reaching forth to those things that are before. (Philippians 3: 12.)

Thoughts For Our Time

By His Eminence Cardinal McGugan (Copyright)

In the Southwest of London, there is a district called Chelsea which proudly boasts of being the home of numerous great figures in English history. Prominent among these is a man who, though executed for his countrymen, has hearts of all his countrymen. Three centuries have passed and Thomas More is now generally acknowledged as the great chancellor who preferred death to a bad conscience.

But the Tower where he was imprisoned is not the place in London we should so dearly associate with his name as is the district of Chelsea where he built his home beside the Thames. For in his own estimation at least, More was first of all the father of a family and, secondly, Chancellor to the King, and it is especially in his former capacity that he is a much-needed source of inspiration for our times.

A charming account of More's family life was given by Erasmus, the renowned humanist, on his return to the continent after several months' stay at Chelsea.

What chiefly struck Erasmus was the marvelous love and harmony existing both among the family and the servants. More, the wise master, healed all strife at the outset. When [political] business called him abroad, his heart was never at rest until he could again be with his family. This personal interest in the education of all his children was an encouragement which spurred them on to remarkable success in their studies. More was particularly concerned about preventing undesirable influences of bad friends, and achieved this by having his children's friends spend some time at Chelsea where their integrity could be observed.

In Canada, unlike, in some countries today where the state has encroached on the rights of parents, we still recognize that man is made primarily for God rather than for the state, and uphold the wonderful privilege of the father and mother to fashion the soul of their child for its lofty destiny.

But we are faced with other dangers threatening the integrity of the family, dangers stemming largely from the many attractions which draw our young people away from the family and convert the home in to a mere stopping - off place to eat and sleep.

It is true that many beneficial social and recreational activities cannot, of their very nature, be provided at home. It is also true, however, that nothing can adequately compensate for a wholesome and vigorous family life as a factor in the moral and social development of youth.

Unselfish Effort

But such a healthy and attractive home life requires an unselfish effort on the part of parents. Neither parental neglect nor unreasonable severity can make the true home. Love must be its foundation, mutual love between husband and wife first, and from this, love for the children.

To the fostering of this bond of friendship in the family, hardly anything contributes more than does the doing of things together. This means common recreations, such as family singing, family games, family entertainment, preferably of a creative nature.

Besides family play, there should be family work. Such domestic activities as needlework for mothers and daughters, carpentry work or gardening for fathers and sons can sometimes be the very detail that will change the house into a home.

Finally, since worship is a social as well as a private obligation, the family ought to pray together. Family prayer, in fact, might more than anything else strengthen the bond of union. We are told that Thomas More gathered his whole household together each evening for common prayer, and this undoubtedly accounts in no small measure for the admirable harmony which distinguished that home in Chelsea.
