ELLEN'S DIARY

day, there is no telling when Gage may be smitten with the misery. "I wonder just how many germs one afflicted person can spread?" Jamie mused this evening. "Would it be only one or two? Or, "he chuckled," enough to pollute a whole regiment?" So when Granddaughter dropped by in that season it was to regard her cousins from behind the closed windows of the truck!

The snapshot—one which was reminiscent of past years, is of Granddaughter, a little girl of six-past, smiling happily against a pretty background of shrubbery

"There's the very rosebush in which a Goldfinch nested last summer," Gage remembered, "and you," he added soberly, "not there to see it!"

She, we knew, was blue-eyed and fair, with bewitching freckles on nose and with long golden braids. There is a bit of uneasiness in her smile as though she questioned the happiness of the hours ahead; and a hint of excitement. Her dress was one she had put away for this special day. It, we also knew, was of gingham in red and white check; her sweater was of red as were the ribbons tying her hair. From her shoulder hangs a brand new satchel, bought from an intriguing young peddler—a new Canadian on a recent round. There would be none better, to her mind. Island-over, for bound within with new pencil and books would be scenes from his interesting van. Like a bright butterfly on wing, she could pose only briefly before she must enter the truck and be off, "over the hills and far away," on a bright new venture. For this picture is of Granddaughter as she was about to set out for another first in her life... a first spell in school! James ends a nap in the armchair to remark with mournful suggestion: "Some wives feed their husbands!" Until tomorrow... Diary... Good-night...
