Murder Is Forgetful

CHAPTER XVII

"Not until you mentioned this place. It would be a natural hide-away for someone who wanted to work on a book."

"Have you found it?" He tried to read her eyes, but they told him nothing. He shook his head. "I told you, I just got here ahead of you."

"I'd never given this place much thought," Kay said. "That's because it was closed for so long. Like you, I guess, I thought of it when we discovered mother early this morning."

"It occurred to you this is where the manuscript might be?" "That was one of the reasons for my coming here now."

Johmy said, "And the other was to find out about this typewritten note?"

"Yes." She drew the paper out of the machine. The words she had typed were an exact duplicate of three other lines appearing on the paper.

Kay said, "This is one of the notes I showed you just after you arrived yesterday. We have two typewriters back at the house, but both of them have pica type. I knew the notes had not been written on them."

"No," he agreed. "This portable uses elite type. It's a different size." He picked up the note and carefully scrutinized the characters. "And the notes were written on this machine. You can see that. The 'a' and the 'e' are slightly out of line in both pieces of copy."

Kay nodded. And she came to her feet, abruptly tense, looking at him out of steady green eyes. "Yes," she said lightly. "but it's not what you think. Mother did not write them. Someone else did! Someone who knew mother's typewriter was here! Someone who is afraid!"

"Of what?" He knew what she was going to say, of course. But he wanted to hear her say it. He was trying to detect anything unnatural about her voice. It occurred to him, naturally, that Kay herself could have written the original threatening notes.

think it is a horrible, sneaking thing to do!" She was trembling with anger now. It was hardly conceivable that she was acting. Johnny said, "Where were the letters mailed?" "In Northport. That was the postmark." "Well," he said casually, "there's no use getting too upset about them, Kay. Almost anyone could have traced back here. I

ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife

Our Trip To Europe

Jennie's hedge of young caryaganas is full of blossoms at present—small sweet peas in a buttery shade, which came as a delightful surprise to the housewives. Lengthening plants and a desire to know had reminded us of late that the time was ripe for erecting a trellis for the lawn sweet peas. This is a chore at which we have always been obliged to summon masculine assistance, in spite of the fact that in the minds of the busy farmers the like is regarded as wholly in the women's realm. We admit these occasions when we must beg their assistance do appear. Not ungraciously they accede to our requests, and yet not always of their own fancy. . . . We chucked over this characteristic of theirs this morning, when it was brought to mind by the lad who in his absence replaced Mr. C. at the home on the hill. "This living alone," he declared "isn't much of a life! You know, women are curious creatures—they may scold and nag and keep you busy from morning 'till night . . . they may growl and complain and get upset over very little, but" he smiled broadly at James "a house is not a home unless there's one of them in it!" So there are times that in spite of any inherent peculiarities of the opposite sex, we find them quite indispensable, at Alderlea.

The Basilica of St. Peter's, the largest church in the world, is so vast and elaborate that I couldn't possibly do justice to any description of it, so I will only mention the things which particularly impressed me. This church, which is built around the tomb of St. Peter, was started in 1506 and completed 100 years later, and designed by Michael Angelo. The door on the right of the main entrance is the holy or jubilee door, which is only opened on jubilee years, which is this year.

The vastness of the interior of St. Peter's is evident the moment one enters and is emphasized by the absence of any chairs or benches, as in St. Paul's. This church is 608 feet long, containing an area of 48,500 square feet, and this great size is appreciated when one notices the lengths of the other large churches which are indicated on the floor. Particularly noticeable in this church is the perfect proportions of the statues and decorative details, which seem so small at a distance and which actually are so huge when one stands by them. The great nave of the church has three arcades on either side.

Of particular mention as one proceeds up the church to the right is the bronze statue of St. Peter, the toe of which, having been kissed by so many faithful, is nearly worn out. Most of the statues are by the famous sculptor Bernini, the bulk of which concerns St. Peter or the disciples. On the altar is a beautiful marble statue of the Virgin Mary holding on her knees the body of Christ, which was sculptured by Michaelangelo at the age of 24 years.

The greatest work of art in the building is the dome, 405 feet high and 138 feet wide; Michaelangelo's greatest masterpiece, which is done entirely in mosaics. In the summit, God the Father is represented and along the vaulting Christ with the apostles. Sixteen windows below let in floods of light on this beautiful dome. Directly below, in letters six feet high, runs the inscription "Thou art Peter and upon this rock I will raise my church." In the medallions are represented the four Evangelists; the pen in St. Luke's hand being seven feet long. From the floor this entire works appear in perspective, and of normal size. The pillars supporting the cupola are adorned with statues sixteen feet.

The Papal Altar stands over the tomb of St. Peter and is surrounded by 89 lamps in gilt bronze decorated with marble. The altar is surmounted by a canopy 96 feet in height, supported by four columns.

Morning Smile

Unlucky

A middle-aged man set off for a house where a child's birthday party had been arranged. "Don't announce me," he said to the maid who let him in.

Leaving his hat and coat in the hall he opened the drawing-room door, through which a buzz of conversation could be heard. Dropping on his hands and knees, he entered making noises like a horse neighing.

There was a dead silence. He looked up and found about six people regarding him with perplexity and alarm. He was in the wrong house.

DOROTHY DIX SAYS—

False Pride

Reluctance To Admit Wrong Prevents Reconciliation

DEAR MISS DIX: My husband and I are separated at present, over very foolish things. I love him very much and I deeply regret the break-up. I really think he still loves me, too, but is ashamed to confess he is wrong. Is there any way I can get him to see I am sorry for the things that happened, and that I still love him? WILMA

ANSWER: A direct attack is the best course for you, Wilma. Either you win or lose everything, but at least you'll know exactly where you stand. Arrange for a personal meeting, or if that isn't feasible, write him a letter, admitting where you were wrong (and if you admit to a little more than you really feel guilty of, remember much is at stake) and ask for a new start. If he still loves you, he'll be only too glad to accept all overtures and meet you half-way.

Pride is a fine thing, in its place, but to wax righteous with false pride and refuse to admit a wrong is small consolation for a broken heart.

HARD TO APOLOGIZE

An apology is the hardest thing for some people to make. The words "I Apologize" come so glibly as a song title, and so haltingly as a form of human speech. Almost any wrong will be forgiven if the culprit will just say "I'm sorry!"

A husband stays out late at night, and returns home the following evening laden with candy and flowers. They avail for nothing as a peace offering unless accompanied by a verbal gesture of apology. A woman who will do anything to give physical assistance to a neighbor considers it belittling to apologize for a careless remark that has caused hurt feelings. Where is there a neighborhood that doesn't have at least one pair of people who "don't speak"—still the rift, no matter how wide, could be closed in a jiffy by an outstretched hand and a simple "Forgive me." Such gestures are far from belittling. They take great moral courage and the longer the breach has prevailed, the harder it is to make apologies. Isn't the mended friend-

For Tomorrow

A DAY of much conflict and contradictions is forecast, with the homely expression "at sixes and sevens" quite applicable to the curious, challenging and critical contrasts in adventures, commitments and objectives. In fact, affairs seem to spell quandary and perplexity twixt thrilling adventure, stimulated energies, reckless and curious feelings, emotions, enthusiasms. A subtle undercurrent seems to surge deep beneath the surface of most practical and matter-of-fact plans and objectives. Fantastic, unique, bizarre, it may demand utmost discretion and direction in order to steer clear of the mystic maze and the irrational.

If It Is Your Birthday

Those whose birthday it is might as well pause for profound analysis and reflection, plumbing deep into the "whys" of subtle, queer, curious feelings and emotions. Matter-of-fact affairs call for tangible, sane and wise rationalizing, clear judgment and shrewd decisions. Major problems and opportunities come up for sound tactics and plans, based on high integrity, regulated emotions, generous and philanthropic purpose even in most critical situations. Justice and truth must sway the aspirations and actions. A child born on this day may have a complex and complicated character, with critical challenge of the practical, emotional.

That Body Of Yours

By James W. Barton, M.D.

BEING HONEST WITH OURSELVES PREVENTS TENSIONS

As a boy I came home and told my mother about an interview I had with a prominent man of our city.

"You know, Mother," I said, "he was very easy to see and talked with me as if I were a man. I thought he would be more important."

My mother assured me that all really big men were easy to see and kindly because they are themselves and do not put up a false front to impress others.

This incident came back to me as I read of an address given by Dr. Bella S. Van Bark, psychiatrist and faculty member of the American Institute for Psychoanalysis, before the Cooper Union Forum, New York City.

In discussing the emotional tensions that come to many of us at times, a sort of gnawing sensation, like hunger, in the pit of the stomach, Dr. Van Bark ascribes them to not being honest with ourselves, trying to put on a "big

Modern Etiquette

By Roberta Lee

Q. Isn't it considered gracious for a hostess to urge more food upon a guest who has already refused?

A. This is often done, but it is very rude and distasteful to the guest. The hostess should never make more than one offer, and under no circumstances should she urge or scold because the guest "is not eating enough."

Q. When a telegram or other message is delivered to a person, and other persons are present, is it good manners for him to open and read it?

A. Of course; but he should be sure first to ask, "May I?" Q. What jewels, if any, should the bride wear for the ceremony? A. Usually only the gift from the bridegroom.

Broiled Meats

It is not necessary to heat the entire kitchen during the summer by lighting the oven in order to broil meat. Pan-broiled meats are just as tasty. Heat the frying pan very hot, place the meat in it, brown well on one side, then turn and cook more slowly on the other side until done. Season after removing from the fire and spread lightly with butter before serving.

Sprinkling Clothes

It is all right to sprinkle the clothes and leave them overnight if placed in the clothes basket and covered entirely with a heavy towel or blanket.

Moths

Branches of the arbor vitae packed away in clothing will keep it free from moths, and the odor is very pleasant and wholesome.
