ELLEN'S DIARY

Safety Of Children Is Chief Consideration

"If only," we said to James at breakfast," every adult would take care to look to the safety of children, fewer accidents would happen to them."
... Our breakfasts are, as we suspect those in other rural homes these times, too often overshadowed by the radio-news of some sad and often young fatality of traffic, or farm or by fire or drowning. And where are the elders? Is the first thought that comes to mind. And we recalled how grateful we, who had noticed the happening, were to some stranger who had taken care of a lad of this farm while crossing at a busy intersection on a recent visit of the family to town. The outing was of necessity early, for a spell of haying lay ahead. So it was a busy time for those who shopped, though we agreed it was an ideal hour for it, in that the busy-ness of the morning had not yet descended on the stores. But on Lower Queen Street, there the brisk pulse of the city was to be felt. The younger farmer had parked the machine there and with Mack had crossed the street on a last errand-to buy a supply of rope for the farm; stout lengths and not so stout needed in replacements for the haying. And there was what we voted was "the cutest piece of all" in which Mack was particularly interested, since it was to be fashioned into halters for such "baby-calves," as may be off to The Fair.

Many drivers do not know that the standard distress signal is a raised hood. It should bring aid as well as help protect you from rear-end collisions while you are waiting.
bite wouldn't go amiss! Oh just anything will do. There wouldn't happen to be, he smiles wistfully, "a bite of codfish about?"
