ELLEN'S DIARY

Rosy Paths Set By Sun For Return Of Its Legions

"Let's— you and me have a talk." Peter the two-pet led there, proposed this afternoon, when we came to visit at the house across the lane.

The sun, brilliant by day, was commencing now to call his legions to return, setting rosy paths for their homing up the valley slopes to the west. The wind was only a breath then. Soon it would follow the sunbeams, and the wild ducks that in a pair, flying high over the creek, had winged up the creek from their day.

"Of what shall we talk?" we questioned.

"He smiled, blue eyes bright. "Oh, of rabbits and kittens!" he said.

"But, Peter, there are no kittens yet! Mack reminded him. "There will be some day," he nodded. "There was an aroma of a supper-dish baking — a scallop of potato, it seemed. Mack catching the appetizing smell suggested to his mother, "Let's have some sausage to go with that," he said.

"He had changed from school-garb to work-clothes and now at an arresting thought had stopped at the door, on his way out to his chores.

"Is there any word in the paper that we are to play hockey in the morning?" he inquired of his mother.

"No, there is no word of it," she replied. "You could try up some smelt, could you, Ellen?" he queries with a yearning. "It's a firange, perhaps, but that is what I should fancy for lunch, best of all!"
