20-Year U.K. Education Plan Is Hailed As Big Improvement

LONDON (Reuters) — Educationists and public opinion in Britain hailed a proposed 20-year plan published Friday to improve education of British youth.

Thirty-one educationists, industrialists and social scientists worked more than three years assessing the present state of public education in England and Wales and recommending measures to help youth meet the challenge of "this timultuous and dynamic century."

The Central Advisory Council for Education produced a wide-ranging, 519-page report with proposals for developing the training of the 15-18 age group.

The council advises that the maximum age for compulsory schooling should be raised to 16 years from the present 15 by the late 1960s.

The 20-year program—to cost some $600,000,000—also calls for a system of compulsory part-time education for 16 and 17-year olds, recruitment of more and better teachers, reduction in the size of classes and spreading the scope of courses for senior specialist pupils.

The council urges a prompt decision by the government on the recommendations, giving precedence to the proposal to extend schooling for another year.

"It should not be difficult to persuade the public that there is as much need for a 20-year program of educational development as there is for similar programs of railway modernization or of atomic generation of electric power," the council says.

ONLY 40 PER CENT

Under the present system, some students may continue state education after the age of 15. But only about 40 per cent of the 1,771,000 young people between the ages of 15 and 18 in England and Wales are getting either full-time or part-time education.

The report indicates English education is lagging behind the times.

The council says the strongest reason for raising the maximum age for compulsory education is a social one — that schooling should extend through the difficult and important time of adolescence.

The report says statistics indicate juvenile delinquency is gravest in the last year of compulsory education and tapers off when a boy goes to work.
