Let's Talk It Over

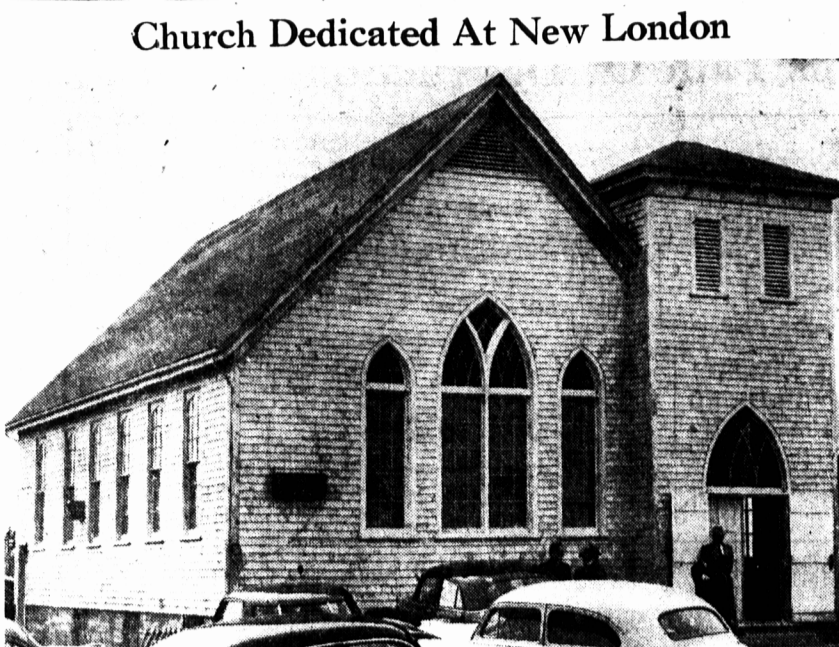

by "d"

We believe the time will come when students taking entrance examinations in Prince Edward Island will not be required to write their memorized poetry, but rather will be asked to recite it. It would seem that this arrangement could be carried out without too much difficulty. A kindly sympathetic examiner, with the gift of putting teen-agers at their ease, could have the entrance pupils funneled in to him from one room and then out into another. They could recite the poems selected and marks could be given for delivery as well as knowledge of content.

Since the poems have to be written under the present system, the students are naturally required to write them in preparing for the entrance test. Because of this, the teacher is between the "Scylla" of taking away a lot of the appeal by requiring the necessary punctuation marks, and the "Charybdis" of permitting sloppy writing habits if the punctuation is not insisted upon. In any case, the function of recitation is likely to be somewhat neglected because teachers will be busy conditioning their pupils for that inevitable test at the end of the grind.

We heard the other evening a group of young singers, piano players, and public speakers at the Summerside High School. We were impressed with the high quality of recitation given by these young people. They were, of course, the "cream of the crop" and their performance could be expected to be considerably above the average. Even among them, however, we noticed a little (surprisingly little we concede), but still a little of a fault which, we believe, is pretty widespread among young reciters. We refer to the habit of emphasizing the wrong word in a line of poetry.

Some years ago, there was a young lady rather noted among her friends for her elocutionary powers. She had a lovely voice, pleasant stage presence, about everything it takes for successful recitation. She could marshal a fine dramatic power, and splendid emphasis, but unfortunately far too often pronounced on the wrong words. The effect was as pronounced as that produced when a piano player hits the wrong note and makes a discord. Much of this could be corrected in the schools if recitation were emphasized more, and this business of learning poetry would be a lot more fun too. Besides individual recitation, a lot of choral work could be done, and occasionally setting the students to underline the words to be brought out by emphasis would help.
