THEY SAY.

They say—ah! well, suppose they do,
But how can they prove the story true?
Suspicion may arise from nought
But malice, envy, want of thought;

They say—But why the tale rehearse
And help to make the matter worse?
From good can possibly accrue
No telling what may be untrue;

They say—Well, if it should be so,
Why need you tell the tale of woe?
Will it the bitter wrong redress,
Or make one pang of sorrow less?

They say—Oh! pause and look within,
See how thy heart inclines to sin;
Watch, lest in dark temptation's hour
Thou, too, should'st sink beneath its power;

GRACE WELDON,

FREDERICA, THE BONNET-GIRL.
CHAPTER XVIII.—Continued.

But how, then, came you to suspect it to be a forgery? asked Mr. Weldon, with impatience.
While I was wondering at the departure of the boy, and had made up my mind to communicate with you, a ragged negro man came in, and inquired for me. I approached the desk, and spoke to him. He handed me a note, and left. Here is the note, which will explain itself, Mr. Weldon, added the cashier, handing to him the letter. The merchant read as follows:

To Mr. MORLEY,
Sir,—I feel it my duty to caution you against paying any checks offered you, professing to be drawn by Mr. Weldon, merchant, on Central Wharf, as in all likelihood such checks will prove to be forgeries, if offered to you by Mr. Weldon's head clerk, or by a lad with light hair and blue eyes, whom he has selected to present them, as resembling Mr. Weldon's son. My motive in warning you proceeds from the dictates of a troubled conscience, for I have been a guilty participator in the crime of deceiving you, with Mr. Daily, the clerk alluded to; but I can no longer be so, and be happy. James Daily began his operations by employing the lad you have so often seen, and who will present you a forged check, this morning, for twenty-five hundred dollars, which I hope you will not have paid ere this caution reaches you. He began, I say, about three weeks ago, by engaging a shrewd youth to act for him, and present the checks. The reason why, after overdrawing, he paid back again the overplus, was to deceive the bank into security, and blind you! This was done twice. In both cases it was the part of a subtle plot, deeply laid by Daily, for reaping, by-and-by, a rich harvest. Of the last draft, for eleven hundred, which this upright clerk forged, and the lad presented, only one thousand were re-deposited, as you will recollect, one hundred being kept back by him. This was only the first picking of Daily's harvest, which he promised to himself. He had now got you familiar with his clerk's face, (the blue-eyed lad,) and had lulled your fears, by promptly depositing when over-checking. It now remained for him to pursue the play in his own way. All he would have to do, when he wanted funds for his private purposes, to pay gambling debts, &c., was to draw a check on your bank, send it by the youth, receive the money, and then so manage that Mr. Weldon would be kept in ignorance of the diminution of his funds. This was, and is his plan. And, as the first fruits of it, he has this morning showed me a draft (forged) for twenty-five hundred dollars, every dollar of which he intends to defraud the bank of; and as I know his next checks will be much larger, and as I tremble for the consequences to myself and brother, (for the lad he has beguiled is my brother,) I have thought it best to inform the bank in season, hoping, that should any steps be taken against James Daily, and he should implicate my brother, that he, as well as I, may be passed over, by reason of his youth, and my present voluntary information given to the bank.

Now, sir, you have in your hand the proofs on which I so boldly charged James Daily with forgery, said Mr. Morley, fixing his eyes upon the merchant. Mr. Weldon made no answer. He stood still looking upon the last sentence of the letter, with a face pale but thoughtful. All along in reading, he seemed to be passing judgment, as he progressed, upon the statement. At length he lifted his eyes to those of the cashier, and said calmly,
This letter proves too much. It is impossible for me to believe all that is here charged against Mr. Daily; therefore I can believe nothing.
Do not believe it, sir! Is it possible that your predilections for this young man can lead you to throw aside such testimony of his guilt?
It is incredible, sir. It would render him the most finished villain in the land!
And so I fear he is, sir.
I cannot, cannot believe that this is true, said the merchant, with strong emotion visible in his countenance. The letter is written by some enemy.
If he has a woman who is his enemy, this fact is enough to show he has not kept the pure society he should have done. Besides, Mr. Weldon, who should know all these occurrences which took place, unless it was one intimately associated with him? How should she know he was about to offer me a check for twenty-five hundred dollars?
It is true. This is a most unaccountable affair!
The letter bears the impress of truth in every line. You see she hopes that I shall get her note in time to prevent paying the money for the check. This is honest, if anything is a proof of honesty; for if the check had been paid, doubtless she would have been the sharer of the spoils, as she hints; for, in all probability, she is or has been his mistress!
Impossible! Such finished depravity I cannot comprehend!
You see how natural her solicitude for her brother! This is natural. She informs the bank, that she may save him from the ignominy and ruin which she foresees would sooner or later overtake Daily and those associated with them! You see the female heart—the feminine tone! If it is written by an enemy, having such a female an enemy shows what his private habits have been.

I will say no more. Let him answer for himself. Shall I call him in? Or shall I at once call the officer, and surrender him to the laws?

Mr. Weldon spoke in a voice sorrowful and stern. The lines of his face were rigid. The expression of his eye severe, yet full of pity.

I knew your regard for this unhappy young man, I was aware of his intimacy in your domestic circle. Mr. Weldon. I therefore resolved to keep the matter in my own breast until I should see you upon the subject.

Sir, you were infinitely kind to think of my feelings.

I therefore took the check, note, and letter, put them in my pocket, called on Clapp, the police captain, got him to follow me, and describing Daily's appearance, bade him stop him if he should see him pass out! for I did not know but that, on seeing me here, he would suspect my business, and try to effect his escape.

But he did not?
No. He sat very coolly, as if trying to face it out; though I observed he colored deeply as I came in.

That was owing to a remark of my own, which I made to him just as you happened to come in; for I saw the blush overspread his face.

You are still disposed to hope he is innocent?

I do hope he is innocent, sir. But let him speak for himself.

As I was about to say, Mr. Weldon, I have kept the matter secret so far; and if you desire it, so long as the Bank has lost nothing—at least but one hundred dollars—I am willing that he should be examined privately.

You are very thoughtful and very kind, sir. It should prefer this course for many reasons. He may prove innocent.

The cashier drew the corners of his eye-brows down, and then arched them, slightly twisted his mouth awry, and smiled incredulously.

I have not such faith. Adam was a better man than James Daily, and yet he fell! None of us are infallible till we are nailed fairly up in our coffins.

Mr. Weldon could not do otherwise than smile at those queer allusions, but it was but a transient emotion. His features instantly resumed a sterner gravity.

If you please, Mr. Morley, I will examine James alone, at my house. I do not feel able to do it now. There, sir, he added, taking a one hundred dollar note from his pocket-book, and laying it before the banker, there is the amount unreplaced which was checked for. As the forged name was my own, and the bank is, happily, no loser, if you will allow the affair to be in my hands, you will do me a favor, sir.

Certainly, most certainly, sir, answered Mr. Morley, delicately folding up the bank-note.

Be assured I shall investigate the painful business as closely as you could wish. If the accused is guilty, I shall not fail to surrender him to the law; for if he is as guilty as these papers would make him, he deserves hanging! I will retain the two written notes, and the check, if you please.

They are yours, Mr. Weldon.

You will oblige me by keeping this unhappy affair secret for the present.

I have no wish to speak of it. You are aware I should not be sustained in my full payments of overdrawing checks by the directors, if the affair should come out. I would rather it should be kept as quiet as possible. Besides, even if he is guilty, he is a young man, and may yet be saved.

If he is guilty, answered Mr. Weldon, with severe emphasis, it would be an imposition upon society to let him loose upon it; if he is guilty, I shall prosecute him for forgery, sir, were he my own son!

Mr. Morley looked in the firm countenance of the merchant with a stare of surprise at the impressive decision in his tones, and then bade him 'good morning,' took up his hat, and bowed himself out. James, on seeing the cashier pass out, and go down stairs, rose from a desk where he had seated himself in the outer counting-room, to complete the writing he was engaged upon, and returned to the inner room. He had not seen Carlton Ellery, who had departed, forgetting his bills of lading, as soon as he saw that the cashier was admitted into Mr. Weldon's private room.

CHAPTER XIX.
THE TRIAL AND THE JUDGMENT.

JAMES SAW as soon as he entered that the countenance of Mr. Weldon was changed, and wore a look he had never seen upon it. He feared at once that some heavy loss had befallen him, the intelligence of which Mr. Morley had just conveyed to him; and he wished to ask; but there was a sternness in his benefactor's manner that restrained the impulse. Grieved that anything should have happened to produce such an air of unhappiness in him, James resumed his seat at the table, expecting each moment when Mr. Weldon would make known to him what it was that had disturbed him.

The merchant continued walking up and down the little room, his hands crossed behind him, his brow depressed and stern, and his whole manner indicative of painful thought. He had not raised his eyes to look at James, but as if unconscious that he had entered, he continued for at least three minutes pacing the apartment by the side of the table. In one of his hands he held firmly grasped the papers which the cashier had left with him.

He had seen James enter, and had observed his looks of sympathy and surprise. But he knew not yet how to speak. The proofs of his guilt seemed conclusive; yet to credit such depravity of one he had so long known; one so dear to him; one he had placed such confidence in as to trust for three years past all his financial concerns in his hands; one whom he was ready to take as a partner into his house; nay, whom he was willing should, by-and-by, become the husband of his beloved daughter. He thought over all the past, and each incident that memory brought up only served to confirm him in his integrity and honor. He cast his eyes upon him now as he sat by the table, and asked himself if that calm, serene countenance was the mask to a depraved heart.

No, it is impossible! he exclaimed, almost audibly; 'it is impossible, if he were guilty, and knowing Mr. Morley has been so long closeted with me, that he could wear so calm an aspect; the only emotion I can discover in his face seems to be surprise and pain, as if in sympathy with me in some grief, the source of which he is ignorant of. Yet these papers! This forged check! This whole history of the drafts and deposits! This lad! This female! If he is guilty, he has the most innocent look that even Satan wears when he assumes the shape of an angel of light.

James, he said, seating himself by the table, and looking him firmly in the face.

Sir! answered James, raising his head from his writing, and fixing upon him his clear open eyes with attention. This look almost convinced Mr. Weldon of his innocence. It seemed as frank and unsuspecting as a child's. But the evidences in his hand forced their strong proofs upon him, and he continued in the same grave tone:

Have you any enemies?

None in particular that I am aware of; but his thoughts in running over those whom he had ever known, rested for an instant on Carlton Ellery, and then on Jack Briggs, as the only enemies he had. 'There is the burglar, sir, whom I tried to arrest, three weeks ago, under the Franklin arch. Jack Briggs! He has always been an enemy to me.'

ALL CURES MADE EASY!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

Bad Legs, Ulcerous Sores, Bad Breasts, and Old Wounds.

No description of wound, sore or ulcer can resist the healing properties of this excellent Ointment. The worst cases readily assume a healthy appearance whenever this medical agent is applied; sound flesh springs up from the bottom of the wound, inflammation of the surrounding skin is arrested and a complete and permanent cure quickly follows the use of the ointment.

Piles, Fistulas, and Internal Inflammation

These distressing and weakening diseases may with certainty be cured by the sufferers themselves, if they will use Holloway's Ointment, and closely attend to the printed instructions. It should be well rubbed upon the neighboring parts, when all obnoxious matter will be removed. A poultice of bread and water may sometimes be applied at bed time with advantage; if the most scrupulous cleanliness be observed. If those who read this paragraph will bring y under the notice of such of their acquaintances whom it most concerns, they will render a service that will never be forgotten, as a cure is certain.

Rheumatism, Gout and Neuralgia.

Nothing has the power of reducing inflammation and subduing pain in these complaints in the same degree as Holloway's Ointment and purifying Pills. When used simultaneously they drive all inflammation and depravities from the system, subdue and remove all enlargement of the oints, and leave the sinews and muscles lax and uncontracted. A cure may always be effected, even under the worst circumstances, if the use of these medicines be persevered in.

Eruptions, Scald Head, Ringworm, and other Skin Diseases.

After fomentation with warm water, the utmost relief and speediest cure can be readily obtained in all complaints affecting the skin and joints, by the simultaneous use of the Ointment and Pills. But it must be remembered that nearly all skin-diseases indicate the depravity of the blood and derangement of the liver and stomach, consequently, in many cases, time is required to purify the blood, which will be effected by a judicious use of the Pills. The general health will readily be improved, although the eruption may be driven out more freely than before, and which should be promoted; perseverance is necessary.

Sore Throats, Diphtheria, Quinsey, Mumps and all other Derangements of the Throat.

On the appearance of any of these maladies the Ointment should be well rubbed at least three times a day upon the neck and upper part of the chest, so as to penetrate to the glands, as salt is forced into most; this course will at once remove inflammation and ulceration. The worst cases will yield to this treatment by following the printed directions.

Scrofula or King's Evil and Swelling of the Glands.

This class of cases may be cured by Holloway's purifying Pills and Ointment, as their double action of purifying the blood and strengthening the system renders them more efficacious than any other remedy for all complaints of a scrofulous nature. As the blood is impure, liver, stomach and bowels become much deranged, require purifying medicine to bring about a cure.

Both the Ointment and Pills should be used in the following cases:—

Bad Legs, Chills, Ulcers, Skin-diseases,
Bad Breasts, Chicago-foot, Gout, Rheumatism,
Burns, Chapped Hands, Glandular, Sore-throats,
Bunions, Corns (Soft), swellings, Scrofula,
Bites of Mosquitoes, Cancer, Lumbago, Sore-heads,
Cholera, Contracted and Piles, Tumors,
Sand-lies, Stiff Joints, Rheumatism, Ulcers,
Coco-bay, Elephantiasis, Scalds, Yaws, Wounds.
