Issues 5-Point Guide For Older Snow Shovellers

TORONTO (CP)—A shovelful of snow, taken slowly and not heaped too full, won't hurt any able-bodied man.

Sports College, a national non-profit sports and physical-fitness research service, took that view Thursday in a lengthy treatise on the subject which, it said, should never get too weighty.

But however you looked at it, shovelling snow was hard work.

Sports College says potential shovel wielders can remove much of any danger involved in snow heaving by understanding the physiological factors involved.

An average determined shoveller, handling about 10 shovelfulls of heavy snow a minute, exerts enough energy to propel him up seven flights of stairs in 60 seconds.

This "is a taxing effort for the normal sedentary male and is extremely dangerous for a cardiac case."

LISTS TIPS

College Director Lloyd Percival issued a five-point guide for those over 40 eager to get at snow-covered walks and who have no recent ailments.

1. Use a small shovel.
2. Lift only small amounts of snow each time.
3. Inhale when lifting; don't hold your breath.
4. Rest after each four or five shovelfulls—don't hurry.
5. Warm up to the job slowly. Shovel lightly and easily for the first few minutes.

A study indicated the two chief strain factors involved were the amount of snow lifted and the rate of shovelling.

Although shovelling was not actually harmful to a normal person, it could be dangerous if there was any physical abnormality present.

By and large, Sports College said, snow shovelling can be good exercise, if done often, and if the amount of work is increased progressively from a minimum level.
