BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess)

COUSIN MANICOU
The Elephant has a handy nose; The Sloth has few but handy toes; In beauty assets though he fail, The Possum has a handy tail.

Farmer Brown's boy, making his first visit to the Land-of-always-summer, had seen a few, very few, feathered folks of his acquaintance, birds who made their homes in summer around his own home, but came down here each winter. He had seen some whom, as he put it, he "almost knew" because he knew they were related to some whom he did know. And he had seen many total strangers, birds of whom he knew nothing, not even their names. But so far he had seen no folks in fur, either big or little, except a cousin of Nibbler the House Mouse, who looked exactly like Nibbler back home, and some cousins of Flitter the Bat. These were flying about in the gloomy shade of cocoa trees where it was quite dark even in the middle of the day. They wouldn't stay still even for an instant, so he couldn't tell to which branch of the Bat family they belonged. He missed Peter Rabbit, Johnny Chuck, Happy Jack Squirrel, Reddy Fox, Lightfoot the Deer, Bobby Coon, and other friends of the Green Forest. It seemed odd not to see any of these or any signs that they were about. At first he hadn't missed them because there were so many other things new to him to be seen. But after a while he began really to miss them.

"Those are cocoa trees."

"Don't you have any of the animal folk in the jungle the way we have in the woods up home?" he asked.

"Of course we do," replied his friend, who was showing him about in the jungle just as he used to show his city cousins about in the Green Forest when they came to visit him. "There are some wholly different from any you live up north, and there are southern cousins of several who do live up there and whom you know."

"Has Peter Rabbit any cousins living here?" asked Farmer Brown's boy.

The other shook his head. "No," said he. "There are none of Peter's relatives down here, excepting some that folks keep for pets. They seem to do all right, so why there are no wild Rabbits in the jungle I don't know. I used to think that perhaps it is too hot for them here."

Farmer Brown's boy shook his head vigorously. "I don't think that," said he. "No, sir, I don't think that. I've known it to be hotter up home, a lot hotter than it has been since I have been down here. Perhaps there isn't the right kind of food. Or perhaps Old Mother Nature just decided that Rabbits are not needed around here. I don't suppose there are any Squirrels either."

"That's where you're wrong, Tommy," replied the other. Farmer Brown's boy is named Tommy. "We do have Squirrels here. They are not the same kind as those you know, but they are Squirrels. You will see some before you go back."

"Where?" cried Tommy eagerly.

"I've been looking for some ever since I have been down here."

"You have been looking in the wrong places," replied the other. "When we are where there are a lot of cocoa trees we probably will see some."

"I guess I don't know cocoa trees," said Tommy.

"You have seen them, without knowing what you were seeing. Do you see those trees over there with red pods and yellow pods and one or two white ones hanging on them? Those are cocoa trees. And it is from the beans, or seeds, in those pods that chocolate is made. Squirrels sometimes do some mischief by stealing the cocoa beans," explained the other. He picked up a small coconut shell, a young coconut that had just gotten well started in growth. It had been gnawed open at the top and was empty.

"Squirrel?" asked Tommy.

"No," replied the other. "A Rat did that. Hello! Cousin Manicou has been along here." He pointed to a footprint in the mud of a small drainage ditch.

Farmer Brown's boy looked. "If I were home I would say that that is the footprint of Uncle Billy Possum," said he. "I would like to see Cousin Manicou," he added.
