

INTERRUPTION NOTICE

There will be an interruption of electric power on our Souris line on Sunday morning, May 31st, between the hours of 4:00 and 6:00 a.m., weather permitting, for the purpose of removing and installing poles to allow for road widening on the Norwood Road.

"But that's nonsense!" he exclaimed. "The woman's crazy! Stango can't do that — and you ought to know it! But what did she want you to do about it, anyway?"

GLADYS M. DRAKE

Gladys M. Drake, only daughter of the late John Drake and his wife, Rebecca Ayers, passed away at St. Paul's Hospital, Saskatoon, on Thursday morning, May 21st. Born at Kingston, P. E. I. in 1902. Miss Drake, as a young girl, moved with her parents to Kedleston, Saskatchewan, where her father farmed for many years, and on his death in 1939, she moved to Saskatoon where, notwithstanding much ill-health she operated a rooming house for many years.

A devout church member, she was a regular attendant at 3rd Avenue United Church in as far as health permitted, and was greatly loved by many relatives and friends. A short service was held in Saskatoon at 7:30 on Friday evening, followed next day by the funeral from Kedleston United Church where interment was made in the cemetery beside her father and mother.

Surviving relatives on Prince Edward Island, besides a number of cousins, include an uncle, Rev. George Ayers of Summerside, and two aunts, Mrs. B. C. Hardy of Union Road, and Mrs. W. B. Leard of Souris.

Nipigon lake in Ontario's Thunder Bay district was named from an Indian word meaning "deep clear water."

after only a day." Thurlow stopped dead. They were within a dozen yards of the top of the slope now and outside the big pile where the Samoans lived. The street was completely deserted here, but they could hear the crackling of the fire which lit up the plateau above them, and the low murmur of many voices.

"When did that happen?" he demanded grimly. "Was it after Person died?"

"No, he was here then," she answered. "He was very drunk with gin and he came into my room and cried. But Strang and Cappie Sorensen watched the Samoans beating Etra, and all the men of the village watched too. It was Strang's order." She looked up at him, her young face sullen and wretched. "And now he will do the same with Losaki — and I, M'fani, can do nothing!" she added.

It was evident that she expected no help from him, and his face hardened as he realised that even in her eyes the representative of the Government was no more than a cipher compared with the all-powerful trader. It was all that was needed to tip the scales of his resolution.

"Well see about that!" he said shortly, and he turned and set off up the remainder of the slope.

CHAPTER XVII
Trial And Retrial

The open space presented a strange and impressive appearance as they came in sight of it. Right in the centre a big fire was burning fiercely, and the glow lit up the whole area vividly and gleamed upon the dark faces of the concourse of men who were gathered there. They were drawn up in a wide semi-circle — broken in its middle by a gap where the fire was burning — and having for its focal point the front of the store-house. Here, upon a strip of matting, stood two chairs from Strang's living-room; and standing midway between this point and the fire, facing the empty chairs were three men.

Two of them were Samoans, clad in khaki shorts and shirts; and the third man, who was naked save for a "lava-lava," stood between them. His wrists had been bound behind his back, and his drooping shoulders and dejected attitude bespoke the prisoner awaiting judgment. Standing slightly in front of the semi-circle of spectators, four more of the Samoans were spaced at equal distances, and the remaining pair were waiting at the foot of the steps leading up to the trader's bungalow.

Of Strang himself there was no sign at the moment, but it would seem that he was momentarily expected to put in an appearance, for all faces were turned in the direction of the house. A buzz of low-voiced talk filled the air, but this ceased abruptly as Thurlow thrust his way through the nearer line of Kanakas and strode into the firelit area with M'fani at his heels. All eyes were instantly turned upon him, and even the two Samoans who were guarding the prisoner craned their necks round and stared at him as he headed across towards the trader's bungalow. Only the prisoner remained, with bowed head and eyes sardonically fixed upon the ground at his feet.

He took no notice of any of them, but made straight for the verandah steps, and as he drew near them he received final confirmation of M'fani's fears, for he saw that one of the two waiting Samoans was holding a short, thick stick, from which depended a number of finely woven sennit thongs — a cat-o-nine-tails, in fact.
