ELLEN'S DIARY

Starling & Swallow Shiver Plan Trip To Warmer Clime

This morning broke cool for us at Alderlea. "Down by the old mill-stream."

"Next thing to frost last night, Ellen!" James commented stopping to survey conditions about before he stepped away from the verandah to join the younger farmer choring at the barns.

"It's cool!" Papa Starling said stivering a bit on the garage-roof when we came later to spread the wash on the line beside. "And do you notice, Missis?" he queried softly nodding toward a wire high above the yard "you aren't a-going to have those swallows with you much longer. I'd say. When you see them ranged in a row, quiet-like with not a chirp out of them—they have" he nodded—smiled, "a trip in mind."

The farmers of the name, fire-wood sheltered now and no harvest-field ripe, foregathered to "the other farm" at the far side of Rob's today, where with machines they lifted stumps from a length of hedgerow.

"There's little excuse nowadays for leaving stump-land idle," James offered at dinner. "It's not the labor now of the first pieces of land I cleared. It was done by hand then. And what hard work it was! Now a few turns of a machine and the stumps are out."

By evening the discards were left in tidy heaps or already burnt and in consequence two adjacent fields joined to allow wider space for the farming of now.

While this may be desirable, where wood and lumber and the water-level of the area about is concerned, the sight brings a certain regret to older folk who knowing something of the toll they had in clearing the land, see the pioneers' work and vision lost to the years.

Farther than a Sabbath Day's journey of Scriptural times we took yesterday with sisters and a brother, and Granddaughter, to worship in a Church there. A village-spot grown up, it seemed to us, this town is; wide of streets and of spacious appearance throughout with its yards and gardens and the farmlands about. A pleasant place and prettily set down beside the fine harbor which gave off a million glints, touched as it was by the morning sun. And over all fell the peace of the Sabbath.

A bell (Granddaughter told Mack of it) sent out its golden notes over the trees and the rooftops to summon its folk to their worship. It was of much interest to us to note that among the linkesses on the wrothy wall of past Shepherds of that flock at
