ELLEN'S DIARY
Sunny Morning Brings To Alderlea A Happy Feeling

Papa Starling smiled down at us this morning when we came to spread our wash — "I believe we'd be better off without that pair," Mack observed the other day, looking up at the sun. "We'll see the sun again, if we close up that opening. Oh, not this summer, but I must remember to do it before their nesting-time comes round again. There's no doubt, if we're a little bit of the sun, we'll be a little bit of the sun's thoughts now."

"Did I know it?" Papa Starling exclaimed. "I have I told the wife over and over again during the recent spell of weather. We'll see the sun again, if we close up that opening. Oh, not this summer, but I must remember to do it before their nesting-time comes round again. There's no doubt, if we're a little bit of the sun, we'll be a little bit of the sun's thoughts now."

"Never grander" we agreed "nor" we added "more welcome."

The last summer-glats were back to the millstream, and the slight tawny of sun and shadow, was spread once more on the farmlands.

How lovely it was. And "All things that love the sun" were r-happy. A robin in the birch tree spoke nobly endorsements. Her small speckled one about to try out new wings.

"You can't know you can't" she said. "Wide as stretch your wings wild, and she smiled this. That's it, Dear" she told the boys. And the nestling drifted away to another branch.

"I did it I did it the youngster cried. "I flew!"

"Clear those birds' chatter!" Mack said, mixing a jug of gas and oil for the lawn-mower.

at the garage-door. "I guess they're like humans, glad to feel the sun warm on them, once more — Nice morning, isn't it?" James came by, stopping a moment to look off to the fields. "We should try to get the rest of those mangals weeded today, so we can get to the turn-patch. Not the added with a wry grin "that I'm going to be much help to it, though I'll try to do a little bit."

"And in the wedding, Granddaddy" Mack said kindly "every little bit done to help you get a place on the end of a row."

Swallows lit it above the yard, and dipped teasingly to the golden "Curiosity - oh!" washing himself happily on a sunny path.

"Has anybody seen or heard anything of the three lost kittens?" Alex questioned, coming by.

"No" Mack replied. "Well, it's no good wishing any more. Something's taking them, that's for sure."

"I wouldn't say that" Mack offered. "She'll bring them from hiding one of these days."

"Granddaughter called from the lawn. "And there's a new penny op!"

"But..." we began.

"Come you can spread wash on the lawn when you see the sun" she begged.

"I heard someone say it's the other day, to be sure, but it's the last this year — he was too busy. Light, may I mean?"

"And so offering us many a delight, what a lovely Monday of July's now-falling days."

"Until tomorrow —" Diary — Good-night!

Mr. Albert Murphy capably filled the role of chairman, and called on Donald Glover to read a suitable address.

A couple had two envelopes, a carving set and other gifts were presented by George Stevie and John Harding, Stewart Glover and Carl Stewart. T. the bride and groom graciously thanked their friends for the gifts and good wishes. Music was furnished by Mrs. Clark Harding.
