CRESCENT CARNIVAL

Anna had begun the inevitable objection, when Nana grimly re-entered. She was carrying Drew's small garments in a gingerly way over one arm and, with lips still tightly pressed together, she began to lay them one by one over the back of a chair.

Nana's uniformed figure had hardly vanished through one door before Anna's erect form had disappeared through the other.

The Negroes were close to them now. They stopped singing to nod and duck and grin. Sensing their friendliness, Drew began to smile.

They were gone for nearly three hours. When Breck came back into the house, he found the little boy, stiff and sore from his ride, as Breck had predicted, but wholly unsubsided, and playing on the lawn.

"The time I've had!" Anna said, in a vexed voice, which, nevertheless, betrayed traces of satisfaction.

"I'll admit that the house was cleaner than I expected," Anna went on, as if he deserved some reward for his reticence.

"In love with Celeste!" "Yes, it seems ridiculous, of course, to think of a grown man being attracted to an undeveloped little schoolgirl.

older than twenty-one." "His age doesn't matter. He doesn't appear like anything but a fop and an ass and he never will. I'm sorry you asked him down here. Or anyone, just yet, for that matter."

"Why, Breck, how un hospitable you sound! I thought you liked to have company." "I do, as a rule. But I'd like to get 'adjusted' here, as you call it, before we fill up the house. And I don't think my standard of hospitality is elastic enough to include much of Olivier Fontaine, at any time."

He rose abruptly and began to pace up and down the room. Anna was genuinely astonished at his attitude and slightly disconcerted by it. She did not understand that she had upset Breck by telling him that Walter Avery was in love with Celeste, and that he was already so much in love with her himself that he shrank from the thought of having her come to his house as a guest, for fear of what might happen if she did.

Y. M. C. A. News Last week the "Y" program committee met to review and consider various program problems. Mr. Dan Bell was elected chairman of the committee for the 1951 term.

Two "Y" basketball teams came through with smart performances recently. The Seniors proved to all concerned that they will be a real threat for Island honors when they defeated the Welshmen by a 41-33 score last Saturday.

The Acmy Hi-Y Club has recently turned on the power to finish their share in the furnishing of the Hi-Y Clubroom, the boys having completed an excellent book-shelf made under the supervision of President Bruce Lelock.

Camping is in the air again. The P. E. I. Camping Association met at the "Y" last week and we expect there will be more camping leadership coming from this group again this year.
