

GREAT FIRE at CONSTANTINOPLE.—On the night of Friday or Saturday a fire broke out in one of the kiosks of the palace of Haidar Pacha, inhabited by a detachment of the 13th Light Dragoons. It originated, it is said, in a married soldier and in a fire of all exertions which were made, consisted that wing of the building and most of the clothes and arms of the men. The whole rambling palace of Haidar Pacha is a succession of wooden houses, most of them old and as easily ignited as tinder. Every precaution had been taken to prevent accidents, in the evening all fires had to be put out and patrols went round to see that this was done. But requires only a neglected spark to ignite this seasoned wood which, moreover, as all Turkish buildings have a coating of oil paint. The firemen sent out from England were on the spot and in the very beginning, and so little apprehensions did the fire excite at first that they tried to put it out by throwing buckets of water on it, and the men, instead of removing their things, helped out with their hands. They did not know what the wooden houses of Constantinople are, and thus lost their baggage. Fortunately there was not a breath of wind, and so by great exertions the fire was confined to the kiosk where it originated. Even the nearest building, separated only by a few yards from the kiosk and intended for a regimental hospital, was saved. This was chiefly done by the skill of an old soldier, who is by profession a fireman. He stood upon the frail balcony of the threatened building and directed the hose of the fire engine. How great the danger was you may imagine, as the whole side of the building facing the fire is charred. The rest of the soldiers were not behind in their exertions and behaved well. General Wood proceeded to the spot soon after he was informed of what had occurred, and superintended personally the extinguishing of the fire. While there he had an accident. A piece of wall near which he was standing crumbled down and frightened his horse, which wheeled suddenly around and fell with him, without, however, hurting him seriously. Strange enough the wind got up just after the fire was subdued, else it would have been impossible to have saved the rest of the palace and the newly erected stables, which are only separated by the road from the kiosk. The men who have been deprived of their quarters by the fire have been divided into the other regiment. An inquiry has been ordered to find out the cause of the fire, and punishment is threatened to those who are guilty of negligence. At the same time all stores have been removed.—Times Correspondent.

COMMERCIAL.

The approaching conferences at Paris for the discussion of the propositions for the re-establishment of peace, and the arrival of better accounts from the other side of the Atlantic with regard to the pacific solution of our differences with the Government of the United States, have been the leading features in the commercial history of the week; and as regards both points, everything progresses satisfactorily. The belief in the result of the conference found an honourable and permanent place appears more fixed on the public mind, while the advances made by the press from the United States convey assurance of the most unpleasant cases at issue with America will be explained to the mutual satisfaction of both countries. All doubts respecting the intention of Government to resort to another loan are set at rest by the publication on the London Stock Exchange to-day of a communication from the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE SULTAN at an ENGLISH BALL.

On Thursday, the 21st of January, the rumour spread that the Sultan would attend the ball à la carte at the English Embassy. It seemed scarcely credible that the successor of Caliph Ibrahim and his temporal house of the Mahomedan Empire, would go to see polkas and waltzes performed—yet so it was. Early in the afternoon, the narrow main street leading to the Embassy was thronged with hundreds of people who had taken up their positions in the neighbourhood of the Embassy to witness the Sultan's ball. The Sultan, accompanied by those who were all to be present at his arrival, were encumbering the streets with their horses and carriages. An English garrison of honour, composed of detachments of British and Prussian landers, with the band of the 1st Regiment of the German Legion at their head; marched up to the Imperial Palace, music, and the approach of the palace.

At 8 o'clock a fire lighted on the heights above the Imperial Palace of Teheran, followed by a salvo of artillery from Galata Serrai, was a signal that the Sultan had left his palace. A little before nine he arrived at the gate of the Embassy, escorted by a detachment of the 12th Lancers, and a guard of honour composed of British officers of all arms. At the entrance of the Embassy, the Sultan, in a courtyard presented arms, and the band struck up "the Sultan's march," and "God save the Sultan." The Sultan was accompanied by numerous lamps and adorned with transparencies, which, however, owing to the blasts of wind, were only partially successful.

The ball was crowded with British and Turkish dignitaries, the Sultan was received by the British and Prussian officers, who were accompanied by them he passed amid the crowd of guests who were already assembled into the ball-room, which was carpeted with red and blue, covered with carpets, was prepared for him, to which he was conducted. Having sat down, with the representatives of the foreign Powers, on one side of the table, he received the attendance on the other, he had several of the ladies presented to him, then the dancing commenced. The Sultan was seated at the head of the table, and he stood up in order to have a better view of the proceedings. After looking round the room, he retired to the refreshment-room, where he partook of slight refreshment. He intended to return once more to the ball-room, but he found it was late, and so, after remaining in the refreshment-room for some time, his Imperial Majesty took his departure. Taking the ambulance which he had ordered to be waiting, he accompanied in the same manner as on his arrival, and soon the gates of Galata Serrai announced his departure. He did not return to his palace, but passed the night in a kiosk belonging to his brother-in-law, Ahmed Ferid Pacha.

One must remember the religious prejudices of the Mahomedans against all trivial amusements, and the strict rules of etiquette which prevail everywhere, and it is not surprising that the Sultan with the representatives of foreign Powers, in order to appreciate this act of the Sultan, he has conducted the house of the countries would be a polite but insignificant ceremony receives here a certain political importance. It is the first time that a Sultan of the East has attended a ball. The fact of the representative of a foreign Power with his presence. As the successor of the Prophet and the Caliph of the East, the Sultan, in the eyes of his Mahomedan subjects cannot do on a footing of equality with any other European sovereign. The fact of the Sultan's history, and the doubts of the more enlightened among the Mahomedans, this idea is still the prevalent one among the masses, who remember only the time when the Sultan was the undisputed Lord of the Mahomedan East, and representatives of foreign Powers were only invited as guests at Court. The fact of the Sultan's visiting the house of a foreign Ambassador is more calculated to open their eyes to the fact that the Sultan is at present, than any other, and it required a great amount of moral courage in the Sultan to make this first step to break down these false but cherished ideas by his own will. The way in which this was done shows, however, that he entered fully into the spirit of this new position. His ideas by the Sultan, who has been so long confined to Europeans, is full of meaning in this respect. Every act of the Sultan's private life is so justly considered as a public act, that he is obliged to except a chief attendant is allowed to attend at his meals. This rule, originally intended as a safeguard against poisoning, forms the basis of the Sultan's domestic and social life. Every contact with his person is likewise strictly forbidden by usage to the Sultan, and he is surrounded by a guard of the Baidar, when the highest dignitaries, and only those, are allowed to kiss his feet; and at the ball on Thursday, the Sultan, accompanied by his wife, walked down with him the whole length of the staircase to his carriage, in the presence of a crowd of attendants and a guard of honour.

But this act gains the greatest importance from the time at which it happens. It is a kind of sanction to the concessions which are to be made to the non-Mahomedan subjects of the Sultan, and it is a great step towards the abolishment of the Mahomedan ruling race, their head, the Sultan descends, by his own free will, from the position which he has hitherto occupied, and he is the representative of Christian Powers. The Sultan of the East, or the ball on Thursday last was the burial ceremony of the Sultan's father, and the Sultan's waltzes his funeral march.—Times Correspondent.

THE CONFERENCE.

Lord Clarendon leaves London this morning for Paris to attend the approaching Conference. The war office will be in capital the same evening. Several of his attaches have already preceded him. The representatives of the several Powers are also on their way to the same place; but it is not yet known whether they will arrive before the 23rd inst., and the Turkish Minister Count Orloff, the Russian Plenipotentiary, was at Berlin on the 14th, and left yesterday for Paris. The Prussian Minister will be assisted by Baron Brunow, the Russian minister at the English Court.

If we may judge from the tone of the St. Petersburg papers, the Czar is sincerely desirous of peace, and he is not less desirous to breathe the most pacific intentions. This is well, but a new difficulty has arisen in a quarter where it was least expected. The intelligence from the Crimea is to the effect, that the prospect of a peace is extremely unpopular with the French army there, and as Louis Napoleon cannot afford to be independent of the army, this feeling may have an important effect on the forthcoming Conference. The feeling is not so general if not untrue is exaggerated; but we fear that our allies in the Crimea, do not share the views of the head of the French people. But whatever may be the feeling of the soldiers, it is not so easy to know, that the French nation is decidedly favourable to a termination of hostilities, and this fact cannot fail to strengthen the moral firmness of the Emperor.

As regards our own Parliament, it must be admitted, that great discretion has been shown on this delicate subject since the commencement of the session. All parties have carefully avoided saying a word in regard to the war, and the difficulties which it is the object of the conference to settle, and this wise course will no doubt be pursued until the matter has been brought to a satisfactory close, or hostilities have been renewed. The war, however, too, on the part of the people of this country, has been considerably cooled down during the last few weeks, now that the press has almost unanimously avoided discussing the question of peace, and the feeling, which we sincerely hope may not be the case, a feeling of regret will be general that more lives must be sacrificed and more money expended in a cause which is likely to be so barren a result. It is not surprising, therefore, that recently transpired respecting the fall of Kars, show the utter worthlessness of the people in whose cause we have been fighting, and these distressing revelations will not be long in making their way to the contest recommencing.

The chances are greatly in favour of a lasting peace; but the preparations for the next campaign are pushed forward with an energy which is likely to be unobtainable, and the mortar boats, which ought to have been ready twelve months back, are now fully equipped, and this determined attitude will aid materially in inducing Russia to listen to the proposals of the Western Powers with discretion. In the organ which is supposed to reflect Mr. Disraeli's views, a strong stand is made in favour of admitting Prussia to the approaching Conference in Paris, but the feeling is almost entirely confined to the journal in question: Every one knows that the conduct of Prussia from the commencement of the struggle has been utterly contemptible, and it would be completely unjust to allow the Allies to enter, except on conditions which would empower, if the war should be renewed, to abandon the pleasant neutrality which she so conveniently assumed. The policy of Austria is sufficiently defined throughout; but that Power has displayed some sympathy in our successes, while from Prussia we have met with nothing better than ill-disguised hostility.

Accounts from Tiflis state, that General Williams was unwell, 100 brass guns taken from Kars have been mounted in one of the squares of Tiflis.
