"Then don't spoil your good record this time," said Rutter. He looked at Prinz for a few seconds and then said: "So it seems that all is ready. Everything is in our favour — apart from the weakness of Zakas. He would have been weak in any case — so that does not present a new factor." He settled himself more comfortably in his chair. "So the operation takes place shortly after midnight," he said, more to himself than to Prinz. "I can hardly believe it. I have waited so long, dreading each day that something would happen to destroy the entire scheme. For if I lost my sight, how can the researches be continued? This is no selfishness on my part. My work demands it of me. I must go on."

For a time there was silence in the room. Then Prinz stood up. "I must go and talk with Zakas," he said. "Tonight, Dr. Rutter, we shall take the first step to restore you to perfect sight."

Rutter grinned.

"Don't let your confidence make you careless," he warned.

Prinz went out on deck and encountered the captain, who was just coming down from one of his periodic visits to the bridge.

"You looked worried," said Prinz, lightly.

"The fog shows no signs of lifting, doctor," Zakas grimaced.

"Never mind that," said Prinz.

"I wish to talk with you. I will come to your cabin," said Rutter. "Very well, doctor," said Zakas, in a tone which indicated clearly that he found no pleasure in the idea.

Once in the cabin, with the door shut, Prinz said curtly: "We will forget the fog for a moment. The operation is to take place tonight — soon after midnight." He saw that the captain was about to protest and motioned him to remain silent. "That period has been selected because John Oliver will be on watch. The less he knows of this business, the better. Lacoste comes off watch at midnight. Is there any risk of him staying awake?" Zakas shook his head.

"I have never seen a man like him," he said. "He has but to lie down on his bunk — and he is asleep. And it is no easy thing to awaken him." "Very good. You know that you have to warn the passengers that they must stay below?" Zakas gave a slight smile. "It will hardly be necessary — with the weather as it is," he commented. "The weather is most convenient," said Prinz. "You can give that as the reason for your order. Make it clear, though, that there is no prospect of danger." "I do not know whether they will believe that," said Zakas. "After all, they can see for themselves."

Prinz shrugged his shoulders. "So long as they obey your orders I care nothing for their feelings. If they wish to fear — let them fear. There is one other thing. I wish you to give a short note to one of the passengers — not a verbal message would be better. Tell him the order does not apply to him, and that he is to come up to Dr. Rutter's cabin at a quarter past midnight." "TWO HUNDRED POUNDS" "Dr. Rutter's cabin at a quarter past midnight," repeated Zakas. "Do not let anybody else overhear the message — and deliver it without attracting attention," Prinz instructed.

"I will be most careful," Zakas promised. "As you know, I shall need your help during the operation. I shall see you beforehand and tell you precisely what you have to do. You will not find it difficult. And if you feel any sudden squeamishness, banish the thought. Concentrate instead on the two hundred pounds you will earn." An acquisitive gleam came into Zakas' eyes. "Two hundred pounds?" he questioned. "Yes, English pounds," Prinz smiled. "I see that you already feel better about it. That is good. Of course, the passenger who is volunteering for this will receive far more. But that is only reasonable. Five hundred English pounds. That will make him a comparatively rich man, eh? A change after poverty and destitution." "It is a wonder they did not all volunteer," said Zakas, obviously impressed by the magnitude of the figure. "I agree," said Prinz. "That was one of the reasons for our decision to do it as secretly as possible. Also, it is the desire of the passenger — who fears that the others might try to rob him when they discover his sudden wealth." "Ah!" said Zakas. "They are a pack of wolves, these people." "So all is understood, eh?" asked Prinz, making an effort to sound agreeable. "You will merely assist me with the anaesthetic.

But there is one small point. When the passenger comes to the cabin, we will put him out quickly," he laughed. "We do not want any last minute backing out." (To be continued)
