ELLEN'S DIARY

Every Man To His Post

"This is backward weather," a visitor to the yard this morning, commented. "The winds keep cold. We used to say that came from ice off the Gulf. But now," he chuckled, "we blame it on the tests they make with the H-Bombs. Everything's mixed up nowadays, isn't it, Ellen?" he offered.

"Yes, it keeps dampish and cool. And the worst of it is," he said moving off to the barns where the men were at the choring. "There's so little grass yet. And the hay is getting scarce enough in our neighborhood now."

In the matter of hay, Dame For une has seen fit to smile on our farmers, giving them plenty. It was she, we suppose who last summer in the delectable season of the haying, whispered in ears reminding them to be well prepared for the period of stabling ahead. So, added to such mowings as they have carefully from this and that field of the place, they bought and brought in both hay and bedding straw to insure an adequate supply. If through the winter there were occasions when uncovered beams in lofts indicated ebbing stores to give James some concern, there will be as it happened, plenty to bring flock and herd to the grass.

Part of the flock has already been turned to permanent pasturing at the other farm while the remainder is kept by day on the grass of a near field and driven to their shelter before dark. If odd adventuring ewes break out bounds to "tiptoe through the tulips" and nibble precious plantings on respective lawns, at least one of the Family declares the housewives should regard this as a blessing rather than an annoyance because of the exercise thus afforded them in herding the animals to less select herbage.

And this afternoon, sunny and pleasant a company of yearlings of the cattlekind enjoyed their first spell on pasture after a long confinement to stable.

"Get the broom—and follow me!" Mack said breezing into the serenity of our kitchen this evening. He picked up and buckled on his gun-belt and tucked a shiny fire arm in the holster.

"The broom?" we echoed.

"Yes," he replied, making for the door, "my grandfather said so. We're going to round up the young cattle. After being out for a spell, you know what it will be like to get them back in the stable again. Come—Daddy's gone before this to bring them!"

It was good to be there—nice in that pleasant time of day when the afterlight blesses so gently the farmlands—when the day spent and worn, honored and abused and used, commences to retire and the peace of advancing dusk is over all.

"It's a grand evening, isn't it!" we said to James, come to stand beside us there at the edge of the near field, his eyes turned to the rise of hill whence the cattle should come. "Hear that robin sing!" we smiled.

"Never mind the robins, Ellen" he returned, "we've more to think of right now!"

They came then, the youngsters of cattle, like a parcel of bewildered children overcome by the newness of it all.

"Now then," James said marshalling his help, "every man to his post!"

As the Night now appoints her stars to "swing high, swing low" and leaves one for us eastward in the birchtree's branches to be our company through any spell of wakefulness, while our world about is asleep

Until tomorrow — — —Diary—

HOUSEHOLD HINT

When making a garment with one of the newer syntheitc materials, remember that these man-made materials need a little more attention when cutting or stitching them. Use only chalk for marking, and cut with long, even strokes. Be sure to leave a generous seam allowance, and pink the edges if the fabric has a tendency to ravel.

Mercerized cotton thread will work on most synthetics, although if the fabric is sheer or all nylon, better match thread to the fabric to guard against seam pull. Cut, do not break the thread, and cut and sew with a tissue paper backing if the material is sheer.

The annual general meeting of the Charlottetown Business and Professional Women's Club was held Monday evening, May 14 in the lounge of the Charlottetown Hotel. The president Miss Dorothy Cullen was in the chair. Beautiful yellow and white chrysanthemums centered the head table.

After the dinner the president gave her report. Miss Cullen who had the distinction of being president centennial year, in her report noted several events both in our province and outside it that are significant in the advancement of women.

One of these was the appointment in July of Mrs. Elsie Inman of Montague to the Senate of Canada. Miss Cullen also mentioned that legislation was introduced in the House of Commons during the present session providing that equal pay for equal work should be compulsory in industries under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Government.

The big event of the Charlottetown B.P.W. was the centennial weekend get-together for Maritime Club members and a few from Ontario who attended. This was an outstanding success, thanks to the hard work of the committee convened by Mrs. Helen Dunbar and the enthusiastic support of all members. Business women's week and a representative named to the permanent Convention Committee of Prince Edward Island were also highlights.

Through-out-the year the Club has co-operated in different comunity projects. Miss Cullen closed her excellent report by quoting Mrs. Maudie Baylay, First Vice-President of the Canadian Confederation: "To improve the status of women and to improve women to fit that status."

The treasurer's report was ably presented by Mrs. Chris Pickard, and reports were given from convenors of standing committees.

The new executive: President, Miss Bessie Prowse, Vice-president, Miss Iphigenia Arsenault, Recording Secretary, Miss Margaret Collins, Correspondence Secretary, Miss Dorothy McKenzie and Treasurer, Miss Florence Simmons were installed by Miss Helen Yeo. Miss Yeo stated that she felt it a happy privilege and a responsibility to install the executive. The new president Miss Prowse took the chair and the meeting was then adjourned.

MARY HAWORTH

Adoptive Mother Is Burdened By Grief

MARY HAWORTH'S MAIL

Dear Mary Haworth: My husband and I are a young couple in our late twenties, and about a year ago we adopted the most precious baby in the world-then two months old. We wanted a baby so badly and since four had been lost us, you can imagine how much it means to us to have this little one.

My reason for writing is my concern for the baby's natural mother. We don't know her, of course, only that she was a very young girl. I think of her so much, especially on holidays, the baby's birthday, etc. I cry myself to sleep thinking of her, and wondering if she is longing for her baby. I know it is impossible but I wish I could tell her how happy and healthy her little daughter is, and how very much she is loved. We thank God each day for entrusting such a sweet child to our care.

What can I do to get over this feeling for the baby's mother? She must be a lovely girl, her baby is so sweet, Thank you for any suggestions. G.R.

SELF-PITY?

Dear G.R.: It could be that your grief for the baby's natural mother is a little morbid, and that it is a familiar with the bleak sorrow of projection of disguised self-pity

In having lost four babies of your own, naturally you become deeply such deprivation. And now that you have a beloved adopted child to care for, perhaps the routine of the mothering experience, and the child's sweet responses, keep you mindful of the earlier sorrows—wondering what your vanished children would have been like, had they lived to this age.

And at this point in your unconscious conjecturing, perhaps a tide of personal heartache wells up, that you convert, as it were, into pity for the other mother, who has "lost" her child to you.

SEEMS WE WEEP

In general, it is true that we weep more for ourselves, and our remembered shocks and griefs, than for the woes of others, when we seem to shed tears for them, sympathetically. Indeed, it is personal acquaintance with sorrow that gives us "understanding" of others' tribulations. Drawing on our past experience, we identify ourselves with them, in their ordeal, and again "live through" what they are going through. Thus our commiserating attitude is apt to be more self-centered than other-centered, believe it or not.

Perhaps this explains your excessive sentimentality, in crying yourself to sleep, thinking of the other mother, whose child you have. This kind of emoting, as a habit, isn't wholesome or warranted. It is understandable that you might have powerful pangs of compassion for her; but to indulge yourself in childish sobbing, in respect to her is simply childish. It suggests that you have need of expert pychiatric or pastoral counsel, to help you accommodate maturely to your heavy loss of children.

PRAYER HELPS

However, I don't discount the potential value of your concern for the other mother. In my opinion, it is possible for you to help her immeasurably, and to bring her "the peace that passeth understanding" (in case she is heartwrung), by daily lifting her needs to God in prayer. To do this effectively, it isn't necessary for you to know her personally; but only that you be loyally mindful of her welfare, as a person whose life is linked in Providential ways with yours. M.H

Home Decorating Aids

Everything conspires these days to persuade a woman to make her own bedspreads and slipcovers her own curtains and draperies.

Sewing machines are treated to various improvements, making for easier operation yet offering a wider variety of stitching and techniques. As for fabrics, the choice weaves and the luxury touches, once available only in costly ready-made or decorator-ordered designs from the leading houses, are now available by the yard.

Ruffles no longer have to be shirred, but are sold by the yard. Woven cords can be drawn through the fabric to give it fullness and are easily removed when the fabric is being laundered.

Decorative headings with attached loops can be applied in record time to curtains or draperies. All sorts of decorative hardware make for ease in hanging and, even more important, easy and speedy rehanging after laundering.

Fringes, welterings and tricks in slipcover construction allow a homemaker to be her own decorator with a minimum of effort and expense. She can observe the extravagantly beautiful blankets in luxury stores, then go right out and buy nylon velvet or glazed chintz by the yard and bind her blankets in the same elegant fashion.

And if she doesn't feel at home with a needle, she can do her sewing with a gadget that applies a sealing device to the fabric and which, with firm pressing, holds hems and seams as securely as stitching would do.

Home furnishing displays suggest interesting ideas and combinations for dressing up the bed.

..The new seersuckers and chintz, that go so well with Early American furniture, are prettier than ever and fine Swiss cottons, lacelike and airy, go beautifully with the wrought iron and brass bedsteads so much in demand these days.

QUILTED FABRICS

Denim and lush quilted florals demand modern settings, while sculptured weaves and hand-blocked prints pair beautifully with a variety of room settings—both period and modern.

And there's new beauty for the ever-popular candlewick and chenille spreads, for these standbys have been given a real glamour treatment. Knit or crocheted spreads are even more in fashion than ever ,often accompanied by trailing skirts or ruffles of such contrasting material as glazed chintz or chambray, to give both color and exciting texture contrast.

It is as well to remember that only the permanent finish glazed chintz retains its glaze during repeated washings, so that point should be doublechecked.

SUAVE SHEATH

BY VERA WINSTON

An exquisite piece of linen in a tweed weave, the color, beige, is used for this suave sheath. Seaming forms the buttoned down plastron marked by four white pearl buttons. The detail terminates in a buttoned down peplum effect at the hips. It is accompanied by its own beige, black and white plaid box jacket with collar and lining of the dress fabric acting as liaison.
