RIPLEY'S BELIEVE IT OR NOT

CONTRACT BRIDGE By B. JAY BECKER

Opening lead—four of spades. Back in 1953, Ely and Jo Culbertson played a long challenge match against Hal and Dorothy Sims. Though the match did not capture the public eye nearly as much as the famed Lenz-Culbertson encounter staged several years earlier, it was still followed with great interest by many of the faithful. At the time, the two biggest names in bridge were Sims and Culbertson. Sheppard Barclay had aptly described Sims' stature among experts by saying he "bestrode the field of contract bridge like a colossus." A giant of a man, Sims was one of the great card players of all time. He had an instinct for card play which combined excellent technique with his dominating personality to produce the maximum number of tricks in virtually every hand. But in this deal he met his master in the form of the brilliant but shy Jo Culbertson. On the bidding sequence shown, Mrs. Culbertson decided to lead the four of spades. The underlead of aces against suit contracts is a practice severely frowned upon in expert circles. But Mrs. Culbertson reasoned that Sims' unwillingness to play notrump stemmed from weakness in spades and that dummy was marked with some spade strength by virtue of the three notrump bid. A neutral lead, such as a trump while it could hardly cost a trick by itself, offered no future. It would give Sims the opportunity to establish dummy's side suits. So Jo, taking advantage of an ideal setup, underled the spade ace. Sims, after studying the situation, played low from dummy, hoping Mrs. Culbertson had led from either the ten or queen. Ely won with the ten and returned a club to Mrs. Culbertson's ace. Jo returned the five of spades. Sims stared and glared at Jo and finally decided she would not dare twice to underlead an ace. He played the jack from dummy. Culbertson took the queen, returned a spade, and a scarlet-faced Sims went down one.

Discipline Of Detention Centres Tried On "Teddy's" By ALVIN STEINKOPF LONDON (AP)—Great Britain is trying to jolt its juvenile delinquents into being proper citizens. Unpleasant tastes of rigid discipline are being used to accomplish what criminologists call "short, sharp shock treatment." The treatment doesn't last long—usually less than three months. But in 70 per cent of past cases, it is said to have curbed the young offenders' anti-social tendencies. Though this looks promising, most officials agree it's too early to tell whether the experimental program is a success. ORDERED STOP It started after a 1957 survey showed juvenile crime up by 20 per cent. Prime Minister Macmillan ordered: "De-Teddy the Teddy boys." Teddy boys are Britain's brand of juvenile delinquent. Reckless and arrogant, their dress copies the era of King Edward VII. Teddy is considered a jazzy form of "Eddie." Skin-tight trousers, long jackets and drooping shoulders, shoe-styng neckties, brightly-colored vests and flowing hair are their trademark. From general rowdiness they advanced to crime—mostly burglary, muggings and assaults. Their jackets sometimes conceal lengths of bicycle chains, brass knuckles, razors and switch knives. All this has mushroomed since the Second World War. The detention centres and their "shock treatments" were begun as an "in between" punishment. Four camps are in operation, each with facilities for 75 offenders. Eight others will be opened if the need arises. Sentences range from two to three months. Ages of inmates are 14 to 21 years. Each centre is staffed by a warden and 15 officers—all experienced in some of Britain's roughest adult prisons. They are picked, however, for their understanding of young people. The boys, housed in dormitories behind 15-foot fences, rise at 6 a.m. daily and study or work until bedtime at 9 p.m. It's a rigid, though grind. De-frocked of their long hair and flashy clothes, the Teddies stand erect and stop with lively cadence. They wear flannel suits with wide trousers. They must say "yes, sir" when spoken to by an official. At meals good table manners are the rule. There are a few perps for recreation—perhaps table tennis, reading or listening to the radio. CONSTANT WATCH A prison officer watches the youths around the clock. A physician checks their health periodically. Clergymen give religious instruction. Bad language is a serious offence. A button undone, or a shoe lace untied gets a severe reprimand. The Teddy darts his own socks, makes his bed and has an army-type inspection daily. While officials wait to assess its success, the program already has given some Teddies a new look—that of slightly clipped wings.

Gulf Survey Is Planned

OTTAWA (CP)—An aeromagnetic survey of the Gulf of St. Lawrence is planned for this year to discover the geological linkup between Gaspé, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia on one hand and Newfoundland on the other. The plans are disclosed in the eighth annual report of the national advisory committee on geological sciences research. The report, given earlier to Mines Minister Comtois, was made public Tuesday. "Interest is added to this survey," says the report, "because oil companies have taken prospecting leases on coastal areas of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island and plan test drilling, very little of which has been done before in the Maritimes."
