

Reds Are Suspicious At Geneva Conference

By EDDY GILMORE
 GENEVA (AP)—"Good morning," said an American delegate to a Soviet delegate, "how are you?"
 Though well meant, the greeting was completely routine. But the Russian fixed the American with a dark, slavic and suspicious eye.
 "Why," he said, "do you ask?"
 That's the spirit of the Geneva conference, the fourth big East-West diplomatic gathering in this ancient and beautiful city since ancient and beautiful city since the spring of 1954.
 On Monday the delegates will file into the old League of Nations council chamber and sit down beneath the graphic frescoes of the Spanish painter J.M. Sert.
DIVIDED ON SEATING
 Already there is a hitch over how they'll sit.
 The British, French and Americans are reported satisfied with sitting at tables around a hollow square. The Russians want a round table. The United Nations—which is handling arrangements for the conference—says it has no round table.
 So that's up in the air.

The very, very, very important delegates will sit in a set of sofas. Behind them will come the very, very important delegates on slightly harder chairs. And behind them the very important delegates on considerably harder chairs.
INFORMATIVE CRUMBS
 It's hard to tell the occupation of some of the members of the delegations. The Americans once had a man who could lip-read in Russian. When Nikita Khrushchev turned to Nikolai Bulganin and said, "Those herrings I ate last night are not sitting too well," the Americans knew it.
 When the first days session is over the social scramble starts—from villa to villa in long limousines. These social get-togethers are designed to relax the delegates, create a more informal atmosphere, sound out the Russians and fervently hope somebody gets indiscreet.
 After a week of this some delegates will start looking at the calendar. Someone will ask a Russian how long he plans to stay.
 "All summer," he'll reply. "I like the Geneva spirit."
