Bugs: U Of T Building Closed Due to Bugs?

TORONTO (CUP) - Administrators closed a University of Toronto building March 19 claiming renovations are making the building dangerous to use.

Construction on the upstairs - located directly above a student cafeteria - has caused plaster to fall on several occasions, said U of T official Robin Toderain.

"It's a safety issue," Toderain said.

Dean of residence Isobel Heathcote said the closing is long overdue because the renovations have stirred up cockroaches in the Union's eating areas, prompting student complaints and a student boycott.

"I've been pushing it for two weeks," she said. "I think it's overdue. I should know. It's my students that eat there."

But Toderain said the Union's closing is not related to the roaches.

The building will reopen in the fall, Toderain said.

The UBC administration also denounced the newsletter.

"Certainly, the people in the [president's] office find it distasteful and disgusting and are asking how can we stop this from repeating itself," said UBC vice-president K.D. Srivastava.

Dean Axel Meisner, asked to investigate the incident, said, "I do not consider this publication a prank. And because it was produced by the EUS, I hold the individuals responsible for the publication."

The UBC president has the power to refuse to collect fees for a society that publishes racist, sexist, or homophobic material, which could apply to the engineering student council's $32,000 of student fees.

UBC vice president Daniel Birch said it was too early to tell whether the council would have lose their funding

Engineering student council president Darren Sanders said the application form, as well as several similarly offensive jokes were mistakes. "We are not trying to defend what's happening, but are taking quick action."

Sanders said the council executive has decided to issue a letter of apology.

Sanders hoped the university would not withdraw funding and would take into account the speed with which the EUS are trying to rectify the problem.
