Automation Poses Worry For Scientists

NEW YORK (AP)—Two scientists picture a gloomy future for the United States because, they say, not enough thought is being done on the problems raised by automation.

Dr. Victor Paschik, an engineering professor at Columbia University, warned 30 delegates to a science conference Saturday that without more action to help minority groups and the technologically displaced, there could be 'an explosion' unprecedented seriousness.

Earlier a social scientist, Dr. Donald Michael, also predicted a series of social disasters.

He told the third annual conference that without more action to help the first trouble will come when Negroes find the seam.

Extension Granted For Pier; Mid-July Is Service Date

Vital rubber mounts used in the tender system will not arrive here until early July. When the other two are assembled at the plant and ready for shipping, one fill cell is ready for capping, and the other one soon will be.

The officials feel that barring unforeseen difficulties the pier should be ready for use by the middle of next month.
