Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur The earliest reference to the domestic pigeon in America is by Lessarbot, who, in 1606, mentions that the only poultry in Port Royal, Nova Scotia, were hens and pigeons.

The moon, like some men, never will get rich because she spends all her quarters getting full. There's not much food value in edible mushrooms because they contain 90 per cent water.

When the Hudson's Bay first operated in Canada's Northland Eskimo mothers nursed their babies until they were three years old and then switched them over to a heavy meat diet.

Despite improved conditions among these people, life expectancy is well below that of the whites. It is interesting to note, too, that of the 9,439 Eskimos in Canada, only 81 are over 70 years of age.

Twice as many Canadians drink coffee for breakfast as tea. But for the noon and evening meals two-thirds of our people switch over to tea.

Natives of Terra del Fuego still use birds' down c. insects nests for tinder. To ignite they employ iron pyrites freestone. As the source of supply was hard to come by fires were kept up night and day, and if a person was so careless as to let the hearth fire out, some members of the household would be dispatched to fetch burning embers from a neighboring wigwam to avoid having to nurse another fire into life with tinder and fire-stone.

This same practice was once in vogue among the early pioneers of Prince Edward Island.

If Oliver Cromwell's son Richard had not resigned his office of Lord Protector of England, Charles II would never have become King, and the far-flung British Empire might now be ruled by a dictator or president. For the British people under the regime of Oliver Cromwell, Richard's father, enjoyed wise government and prosperity.

The gigantic city of London contains between 80,000 and one million buildings, and there are in London more Scotsmen than in Aberdeen, more Irish than in Dublin, more Jews than in Palestine, and more Roman Catholics than in Rome.

Besides killing birds with bow and arrow the Island Indians tied up stakes short lines baited with small fish, which the birds swallowed head first. Securely bound to the bait were three pointed pieces of wood or bone half an inch in length, with the ends or points opening slightly outwards.

These points drew inward when swallowed by the bait; but the birds, finding the bait attached to something would try to vomit it up. Then the sharp points would open and stick in the gullet of the unfortunate bird. For catching smelts they employed another way. At high tide these fish nosed their way into the creeks of which there are a great number in this province.

Near the mouth of these streams the Indians built ramparts of stone, with spaces left in the center. The tide, being high, the fishermen would come on silent feet, so as not to frighten the smelts, and lay branches on top of the stones, weighing them down with logs. Across the center gap they would place their net of sinew—sometimes branches served in place of sinew. As the tide went out, the water drained through, and the smelts would find their retreat cut off. Sometimes, in this way, a ton of fish were taken.

The Yaghan Indians believed in Wild-men-of-the-woods. They were said to have a bald spot in the back of their heads where they had rubbed them against the trees. They were supposed to be dangerous creatures. The Yaghans also believed in ghosts. These were the spirits of the soul, and bore a greater resemblance to our civilized conception of a phantom than those about which I have already mentioned in my columns.

When a person was drowned by falling from a canoe, a relative would go to the shore nearest to the scene of the accident. Here he would light a fire, sit by it and wait. When the flames died it down leaving only a bed of glowing hot embers, the spirits of the drowned came out of the water to warm themselves.

It is a fact that all primitive tribes had some legend of the flood mentioned in the Bible. These tales differ according to locality, each story-teller setting the scene in his own country or district.

You could put a steer or any other animal in the dark hold of a ship, keep it there for say ten days, then toss it into the sea and it would immediately strike out in the direction of land. Primitive man had the same magnetic compass within his brain, while in civilized man it has disappeared.

Big game hunters know that behind the horns of the mountain goat and other horned creatures just where the head joins the neck, is a vital spot where a well-aimed shot will bring down the animal, but the area is not larger than a hen's egg.

The Bank of England is the only bank in England which has the power of issuing paper money. This famous old bank acts as the agent of the government in all business transactions connected with the National debt. All notes paid into the Bank of England are at once cancelled, so that in some cases the active life of a bank note may not be longer than a single day.
