ELLEN'S DIARY

A Saffron Sunset Fades To Amber And Pale Gold

Sun came today to bless small wishful lads like Alex, wearied with the monotony of November's continued spell of damp. Sun, and blue sky, to provide ideal seas for the cumulus clouds a-float: the great woolly drifting, an accumulation of all the sheeps' wool taken in the June-time on Island farms— the white fleeces, it came to mind fancifully; to make nice transportation for the housewife, who, as she mixed her loaves and tidied her rooms, would board these fairy ships to come to visit far places; or walk where the great of history had walked: saint and martyr and leader of men: to see ancient castles with moat and portcullis, and churches beautiful to behold; in effect to see all the glories and grandeur of the whole wide world.

And then at length homeward bound, mind filled with the wonders she had seen, stop by Island- doors to enjoy a chat, and perhaps a cup of tea with you and you! It would be springtime by then. Or possibly winter would still reign. And nearing home we should look down to see this house, and that across the lane, and the one on the hill, still cuddled contentedly in the snowdrifts. We should recognize those easily because down in the deep of the valley would sit the old landmark of mill. On the slope above the dark figure would be Scampie waiting at the gateway. And we think, James would drop the bundle of hay he was carrying to one of the cow-kind, sheltering in some outpost of stall, and shading eyes against the sunset (It is so good to get home before dark!) would search the west for our cloud.

The west, indeed all the foreground of sky was beautiful at the sunset-time this evening, suffused with a saffron shade as it was, which faded to amber before the horizon was marked only by an edge of pale gold. And the evening star lifted into the blue. And below, above the engaging tapestry of darkening field and the velvet of dusking woodland and grove and tree, floated the crescent of November moon.

James was at the choring then. We saw him carefully set a piggery door ajar, and enter with baskets of mangels, while Peter, his young shadow, waited at a respectful distance for him to re-appear.

"Why are you waiting?" we called from our doorway.

He put up a hand for silence. "I can't come in to help him this evening" he explained. "I might fuss the sows. You see that last litter is new."

"The odd thing about our Fall litters is that they all arrived in the daytime. There were no night-watches this time" James said at supper.

"What are you having, lamb or meat?" Peter had questioned before this surveying the spread table.

"Lamb."

"Oh! And bread" he nodded. "And apple jam and pieces of cake."

"I think our supper is ready too. I'm going home now," he said.

Home! It is a warm and winsome word, when "Home is where the heart is."

Until tomorrow — Diary — Good-night.....

Household Hints

When sewing with a double thread, it will never twist or knot if you tie a separate knot in each end, rather than both ends in a single knot.

Housekeeping tools work better if they are clean, so soak mops, sponges and cleaning cloths after each use in a solution of disinfectant and hot water.

Foam - backed plastic place mats in white or neutral colors double well as pads to use under fabric place mats.

Try T-Bone Veal Steak As Change From Beef

WHILE in Rome I met a most unusual young Italian physician, a graduate of McGill University Medical College in Canada, who has several other degrees and is distinguished for his brilliant yet compassionate work not only in Rome, but throughout Europe.

Meet enthusiastic, slender crew - cut Dr. V. Marcolongo, L.M.C.C., president of the newly formed Association for Medical Assistance to Tourists.

"All the world is on the go," he smiled, relaxing over luncheon. "Tourists are traveling by millions in foreign lands. And just as they may fall sick at home, they sometimes become sick abroad and are unable to find a suitable doctor.

Physicians For Tourists

"More than three years ago I decided it was time an international association of physicians was formed, qualified to assist travelers at standardized fees. So I interested a group of doctors in Europe, many wholly or partly American - trained, whose high standards will satisfy any medical requirement the traveler may have.

"English - speaking travellers will be treated by physicians who speak English and have had postgraduate training in the United States, Canada or Great Britain, all considered to have the highest standards of medical training in the world today.

How Organized

"Doctors have been located throughout free Europe, with the cooperation of U.S. embassies and consulates. Working agreements with hospitals have been set up. The office of the nearest Tourist Center is the place to call for information, so you can contact a qualified physician. The fees are all set and are moderate; no fee-splitting is allowed.

"This helpful non - profit association is supported by a small membership fee paid by tourists to help establish a fund to improve medical facilities and standards for travelers all over the world."

And what does this have to do with a food column?

Plenty — for how can you enjoy your exciting and interesting travel meals if you feel "under the weather"? At home, if this occurred, you probably would consult your doctor for corrective treatment. It's even more advisable to do the same thing, if necessary, while traveling.
