Exit Tony Blount

by Sydney Parkman

CHAPTER II
Continued

Tony Blount lay back and thought over what he had heard. There was no doubt that he was being offered such a chance of This poor devil had not been quick escape as would never come to him again, but, on the other hand, there were big risks attached to it. To begin with there was the question of making the initial getaway.

That in itself would be no easy matter under the eyes of the armed guards. It could be done — it had been done — but it meant watching and waiting for the right moment. And when that moment came the chance would have to be seized upon with lightning speed, enough and had received a wound which had ultimately brought him to this pass. The guards were under orders to shoot at once, and they acted upon them to the letter.

Even supposing he got clean away, however, he realised that he would still be faced with the most difficult part of the task. He would first of all have to strike across unknown country at the risk of coming upon other gangs at work, and somehow find this old clearing. Then, having located the spot, he must take to the mangrove swamps, burdened with a heavy keg of water, and begin the search for the boat. Beyond that point he felt it useless to speculate, but ultimately, remotely, there lay the dim prospect of getting clear of the island altogether.

But that lay beyond the farthest horizon. Nearer at hand and far more easily visualised, loomed the prospect of failure and recapture. He knew what that meant. Even if he were not wounded or otherwise injured, there would be the long weeks of solitary confinement on starvation rations, and the following months in the particular hell of the punishment squad. It was a prospect to make a man think twice before he decided upon making a break for it. And the previous record of attempted escapes were very far from encouraging. Of the five which had taken place since they had started work on the island, three of the men had given themselves up, and this last one had been recaptured — all within forty-eight hours. The fifth man had been shot dead by one of the guards as he made his dash. True, apparently all had been the result of sudden impulse, and there had been nothing in the way of preparation. But they illustrated the conditions grimly.

Nevertheless, he knew that he could not let this chance go by, and he lay awake for some while staring blankly at the rectangle of night sky framed by the window and visualising the opportunities which might occur in the course of the day for making the initial dash for liberty. It was a profitless pastime, but the mere thought of freedom, however remote, was as intoxicating as raw spirit.

All he succeeded in doing was to cause his ill-used head to start throbbing again, and at length he resolutely dismissed the fascinating theme from his mind and tried to compose himself for sleep again. It was long before he succeeded, but at last he fell into an uneasy doze which lasted for some hours. He was aroused by someone shaking his shoulder and sat up to find old Jean at his bedside and the first grey of dawn struggling in through the barred window.

"Up you get, my old," the "trusty" was saying. "Reveille's gone, and you've been reported fit for duty."

Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

Not only did 91-year-old Charles Cornish of Princetown, England, predict the day of his death, but he also told relatives he'd be buried on Saturday. He died on Wednesday and was buried on Saturday just as he said he would.

"You have a banker's job" can't be said about Canadian bankers in remote areas of Canada. Eddie Muir is an accountant in a Vancouver bank, in Kimono about 400 miles from nowhere, to serve several thousands of workers who are his customers. Muir often starts his day at 6 p. m., often in bad weather. Last summer the young bank clerk boarded a plane and flew to the Arctic circle to serve workers at the Canadian government's uranium mine at Fort Radium. And strange as it may seem, log-cabin banks are not uncommon in out of the way places.

He rose without a word and began to put on his clothes, which lay in a heap on the floor at the foot of his bed. His head was aching badly, and he felt dazed and stupid.

"Hurry up," the old "trusty" urged. "I've got orders to turn you over to the guard, and they're due at 10 minutes now."

"All right, all right!" Tony growled. And then, with a fleeting glance through the half-light of the blanket shrouded figure in the next bed: "How's our pal here?"

"I don't know," Jean answered indifferently. He shuffled over to the bed however, and partly drawing the blanket away, leaned down and peered at the man's face. Then he straightened up and drew the blanket right over his head.

"He's hopped it," he said. "To be continued"

Every year the Jackson memorial Laboratory, in Bar Harbor, Me., produces enough mice, white, black and brown, to eat half of Canada's cheese production if they could get at it. The rodents, 1,000,000 of them, are raised for research purposes in the hope of solving scores of different medical and health problems.

Contrary to public belief, birds rarely fly in flocks at night, nor do they cross the Gulf of Mexico on migration, as long supposed. They detour around it.

Song-writer Irving Berlin received exactly 37 cents for the sale of his first song in 1907.

Now let me tell you about the greedy porker that changed the history of three states. Here's how it happened:

Shortly after the Republic of Texas won independence from Mexico, it made application to a French bank for a $5,000,000 loan. France favored the loan, knowing its approval might end in annexation of Texas, so Count Alphonse de Saligny was sent to Austin, Texas to negotiate the treaty. Negotiations were going along well until a pig broke into the Count's storeroom and filled its belly on corn. Then one of the Count's servants killed the porker with a hay fork.

The owner of the pig, learning of the incident, beat up the servant and threw him out on his ear.

Cooling down, the owner of the pig made a public apology. The count wouldn't accept it. He wanted the apology to come from the Secretary of State!

The matter was referred to the senate but that august body not only refused to allow the secretary of State to apologize, but also refused to ratify the treaty with France.

The count countered with a refusal of the pending $5,000,000 loan, and packing his bags set out for France.

The infant Republic then began negotiations with the United States. The two nations hit it off well — so well in fact, that in a short time Texas decided to join the union. Thus it may be seen how one corn-loving porker changed the history of three states, strange but true.

Part of the will left by Jean Rioux, 79 of Limoges, France, read: "A barrel of wine I recently bought must be drunk by those who attend my funeral, and they must be gay and happy during two days."

No doubt there were many mourners at Rioux's funeral.

One doesn't need a house in order to enjoy a home — and here are some facts to prove it. One smart fellow in Alberta bought a discarded bus and made a happy home out of it.

On a farm near Kitchener, Ontario, a married couple are enjoying a home they made from a silo. Where once cattle chow was stored there now are rooms in three levels, providing plenty of space for the family of ten.

Trailer homes that can be left anywhere are so common today that they need no special mention here.

Houseboats are common homes in many parts of the world where there are waterways.

But Mrs. Arthur Ellis, of Revere, Mass., came up with the oddest house of all — although she did not live in it long. The wife of a steeljack, Mrs. Ellis made her home on a platform atop a pole!

Believing that animals ought to be treated as humans, the Woodhouse family of Rickmansworth, England, take their seven cows along when they go to the beach to enjoy their summer holidays. Maybe that's not so startling, but listen to this: The Woodhouse family dressed the seven kine in light coats during the summer; wool-lined coats in the winter.

The Woodhouse family consists of a doctor husband, Mrs. Woodhouse, and their three children, and oh I forgot to mention the seven cows.

A will that caused no end of eyebrow lifting came to light recently when Alex Garrison, a gardener at Quincy, Mass., left an unexpected estate. He willed $35,000 to his employers, Mr. and Mrs. John Hanson, and $5,000 to their shepherd dog, Lassie.

One out of every four drivers of automobiles was involved in an accident in 1952.

Lack of uniform traffic laws are among the chief causes of accidents.

Another major cause of accidents is the unsafe condition of many cars and the lack of adequate and modern highways. We must remember that most of the highways were constructed 20 years ago and moderate the traffic of these times.
