ELLEN'S DIARY

Western Breezes Brought Saltiness From The Strait

"What is it like now, down on the Island? Are you getting any of our heatwave?" one wrote us from a city miles away in her letter received this morning. "Let's stop a minute here on the bridge" Alex, our companion, suggested on our way to the mailbox, "just to see and hear what we can." It is amazing the enjoyment one may get there in moments of quiet. Even the wind in the alders is a precious thing with its little rustlings and stirrings and its summer smiles as it bores on up in the fields of the having. The stream chuckles in a pleasant sound as, born of rock and earth miles up valley, it comes down between grassy banks and ferny woodland and grove to slip beneath the shadow of our lane's bridge, and on toward the mill, and the River below. Summer flowerings adorn the banks there. That a succession there has been since the first clover's, soon the asters will bloom there, and the But it is as well not to let thoughts dwell on those later blossomings. Now is the summer. Fishes fight hither and yon in the clear of the stream, weefling and odd larger trout. "If we might..." the thought is exciting, so much body and mind spirit can catch of good from a spell of idling there. But there is a number of things awaiting one's attention at the house, items that call how rich and intimate are the birds' songs if the quiet! Then one of us speaks, and immediately a wide hush obtains. "What was our day like?" It was hot in the afternoon, though it was not that breathless heat we sometimes experience on an August day. Today's was cooled by a nice breeze of the west, which we agreed also had some south in it — a bit of salt from the Strait! "No great heat then we had. And as is usual, our evenings and nights come refreshingly cool in today's measure, we also had, we recall, dancing leaves, and dappled summer shadows, flowerings of gardens, and ferns, hedges with wild roses and other summery bloom. Trails, which begged one to come a-roving, to see what loveliness might be down in that dip of valley or just over that green hilltop beyond. Because of the having no careless "Come day, go day" these are, but all are busy and interesting and full. Days to admire, to enjoy, to love. And in all
