The annual Christmas Party for the staff of the Prince County Hospital was held at the Nurses Residence on Friday afternoon with Santa presenting gifts. Refreshments were served.

The student nurses directed by Mr. Gabriel Chaisson sang Christmas carols on each floor of the Hospital on Monday in the early evening. After which they gathered in the main lounge of the residence where Santa appeared and distributed gifts. The students council of student nurses held a dance on Monday evening in the main lounge of the residence. The music was furnished by Fred MacFarlane with record player and loud speaker. Games were also enjoyed. Refreshments were served.

Mr. Owen Kelly of Amityville, Long Island, was expected in Summerside last evening to spend a few days with relatives and friends.

START CAMPAIGN
WASHINGTON (AP) — A big "Rockefeller for president" sign went up Thursday just a few blocks from the White House. It was hung in preparation for today's official opening of the headquarters of Rockefeller for president committee of the District of Columbia. The committee is plugging New York's Governor Nelson A. Rockefeller for the Republican nomination.

Next, in saucepan, combine 1/2 c. mild vinegar, 2 c. water, 1 tsp. sugar, 1/2 tsp. salt, 1 tsp. lemon juice and 1 tsp. mint flakes. Bring to rapid boil.

Stir in 1 1/2 c. shredded cooked green beans and 1-3 c. small-diced raw celery.

Rinse 8" by 8" pan with cold water; spoon in gelatin mixture. Refrigerate 4 hrs., or until firm enough to cut in squares.

Serve on lettuce; pass Thousand Island Dressing.

Caniflower Potatoes: Cook and drain whole cauliflower. Put on dish that can go to table.

Cover with Crumbs Potatoes and brown in hot oven, 430 degrees C.

Crumbs Potatoes: Brown 1 c. fine soft white bread crumbs in 1/4 c. melted butter. Add 1/2 tsp. lemon juice and 1 tsp. minced parsley.

MARY HAWORTH

Male Side Of Story Sheds Different Light On Subject

Dear Mary Haworth: May I cut in for a minute to disagree violently with the gist of your expository remarks to the 23-year-old wife who doesn't want her mother-in-law taking charge when her first baby is born in January.

I speak as a man of experience. You suggest that self-distrust and a sense of personal inadequacy are back of the younger woman's hostile anxious resistance to the older woman's would-be helpfulness.

L.R.'s narrative gives ample evidence that her mother-in-law is a pushing, inconsiderate, self-centered, bossy woman. Such in-laws can be poison to the new mother-child relationship. Thus, the more Mrs. X pushes to get in, the more resolutely she should be pushed out; by any method; but OUT.

If she qualified to be a helpful IN, she wouldn't push. The place for the pusher is always OUT.

NEEDS PRIVACY
Recent studies show conclusively that the first impressions of life are of extreme, even determinative, influence on the basic development of a child. Indeed, the first single day has extraordinary importance.

L.R. knows perfectly well that she won't be entirely able-bodied on getting home with the baby; and she knows clearly in advance that she will have much to learn about baby care. She quite properly wants Mother Nature to take both baby and her in hand, and teach them "togetherness" in privacy.

To the degree that the mother-in-law intrudes on that privacy without invitation or encouragement, to that extent she shows that she is not an asset in the situation.

NEEDS DOCTOR'S HELP
Your concluding advice to L.R. is excellent, however—to tell her physician the inside story and have him rule out Mrs. X's plans to move in as "strictly against doctor's orders." He will understand that the development of love (mother-child-father) is a private affair.

Young marrieds who don't want in-laws about are always right. There are no exceptions, except in cases of actual need. S.D.

MAN TAKES SIDES
Dear S.D.: Men hardly ever bother to put in an ear, in disputes of this kind. Which makes your letter a standout, quite aside from the points you score.

It deserves publication as a possible shot-in-the-arm to the young husband, who is showing a bit of white feather, it seems. His wife mentioned that he feels his mother should be brought in, since her heart is set on it.

But now that you've spoken your piece, as a man of experience, he may find the courage to champion his wife's desire for unobscured maternal privacy in learning to cope with her first-born at home. If such is her preference and it can be arranged, the mother-in-law has no sound reason for taking charge; nor for feeling "miffed" if her purpose is blocked.

HELP FOR HUSBAND

Shortbread For First-Footers Signifies Highland Hospitality

It's round and firm and fully packed — and it smells oh, so good! It's a tin of real "Scottish" shortbread, ready to contribute its share of good will and good eating to Yuletide festivities.

We've come to associate shortbread with the Christmas and New Year season, just as our friends in Scotland have been doing for hundreds of years. It's interesting to look back into the colorful history of that proud and talented country to learn more of the story of this "Old Country" treat.

Shortbread, like tweeds and whisky, is part of the pride of Scotland. Although it is eaten all year round, it is associated particularly with the Yule season. In Scotland that means Christmas and Hogmanay (New Year). A big, round cake of the crisp, golden-brown delicacy is considered an essential part of the welcome to "First-Footers," who traditionally come visiting from house to house when the New Year is born.

The Hogmanay shortbread is probably a direct descendant of the yule-bannock (made of oatmeal), which invariably was baked on Yule E'en (Christmas Eve) between sunset and midnight. It was a Scottish custom for neighbor wives to gather at a lying-in and prepare "Merry-meal" to celebrate the new child's birth. Thus the Yule-bannock was baked in honour of the Virgin's new son, and the round cake usually had the sign of the cross made upon it with a sharp knife. This divided the bannock into "fairs" (quarters) before baking, and we see similar markings on many cakes of shortbread today.

Scottish historians tell us that the "Christianized" bannocks descend from an even earlier pagan custom. In Shetland, where traces of the ancient Scandinavian Yule are still evident, the Yule-brunies (bannocks) are baked in rounds, notched around the edge to symbolize the rays of the sun. Behold the Yule-bannock — an ancient relic of sun-worship as the Yulelog!

The modern shortbread of Scotland has been touched by the hand of progress. As white flour was produced and became popular, a whiter shortbread was developed. Today the hundreds of pounds of this delicacy, shipped to every quarter of the globe, are truly "The triumph of the Scottish baker's art."

As the Yuletide season approaches, we see samples of this artistry in our bakeries and in grocery, specialty stores. Many of the cakes are elaborately decorated, often with nostalgic devices like heather, hands across-the-sea, "Frae Bonny Scotland" or "For Auld Lang Syne." Others are decorated with candied orange peel and "sweetie almond." Although large cakes are most common, some tins contain shortbread fingers or small dainty cakes in various shapes and sizes.

There are other varieties of shortbread too. Fine, thin cakes, made with or without caraway, are known as Petticoat Tails. This naming, we learn, is probably a corruption of "pettis gaites," (meaning, in French, small cakes). Other include: Pitaichie Bannocks, round shortbread cakes containing finely chopped almonds and candied orange peel; Ayrshire Shortbread, to which egg yolk and cream are added; Tantalum cakes, containing egg and grated lemon rind; the Queen's Tea Cakes, with egg, grated lemon rind and rose-water; and Ginger Torte, two ginger - flavoured cakes, sandwiched and iced with ginger icing and decorated with green sugar.

Some of today's Canadian bakers are direct descendants of the old Scottish-master bakers. These and others who have worked with them, have been eager to learn the skills which will enable them to create shortbread at least resembling the famous Scottish product. But whether the shortbread we enjoy this Christmas and New Year is true - blue Scottish or Scottish - Canadian, we'll remember its interesting ancestry as we nibble it with our tea!
