

Chilean Teacher Studies Visual Education Here

Mr. Nelson Severino of Los Andes, Chile, is in the province for the next four days studying visual education techniques as applied to fundamental education. Mr. Severino, who is 26 years of age, has been a teacher for the past eight years and was selected by UNESCO to make a study of visual education problems and techniques in Canada, the United States and the British Isles. Mr. Severino has already spent 2 1/2 months in the United States and after he leaves Canada in April he will proceed to the United Kingdom. After he leaves the British Isles he will return to the United States and then to Puerto Rico and Janet Ingles expects to return to her home country, Chile, to apply the techniques to the problems encountered in his own country. To quote Mr. Severino himself: "Audio-visual materials are a powerful instrument to cope with the manifold problems of fundamental education. Because of the multitude of these problems the methods of audio-visual education have to be adapted to varying circumstances and to different environments. The reason for asking to carry out the study programme in different countries is to gain a wide experience in various methods and techniques."

CHRISTIAN CONFIDENCE LENTEN MEDITATION

It is part of the paradox of Christianity that its confidence in the victory of goodness is founded not on a record of success but on apparent failure and defeat. The ignominious end of its Founder is the source and centre of its trust in God.

To any onlooker at the Crucifixion it must have seemed that Christ's cause was lost and everything he stood for discredited. "Let him deliver him if he will have him": but no answer came. Was there no God to answer? One can hardly even imagine the despair which must have overwhelmed the disciples. "There was darkness over all the land"—symbolic of the dark night within. It had been a ghastly scene after all. There is no such God as he believed in. The President of the immortals had finished with Jesus. So they must have felt—and to many in the modern world, hard-pressed by the challenge of experience, that still seems to be the only verdict.

Yet Christian faith was born in that tragedy. The cross is the sign of Christian faith in God. All believers of all affiliations, find here the crucial revelation of God's redemptive activity in the world and the guarantee that life belongs to goodness, not to blind fate or the devil. What difference can be made to-day by the death of Christ 2,000 years ago? Many theories have been advanced, some of which shock the contemporary conscience; but they need not block the way for the seeker. Some Christians at some periods have held them under different historical conditions. It ought to be frankly stated that they are not part of the Christian creed itself. There is no one "official" explanation. The Church confines itself to the facts as they are attested in Scripture.

Two strands in the doctrinal tradition are already apparent in the New Testament books. One thinks chiefly in terms of the perfect sacrifice offered for the sins of the whole world. Here the primary emphasis is laid on the things that were suffered bearing man's burden. This is reflected in such well-known hymns as "O Sacred Head" and "When I Survey," and in the medieval form of crucifix. Certainly this seems to run back into the mind of the Master himself, and his understanding of the suffering servant as portrayed in the second Isaiah. In the other strand, the emphasis lies not so much on the things which he suffered as on the victory which he achieved. "Among the nations God, he has reigned and triumphed on the tree." Jesus by his cross and resurrection—the two are inseparably bound together—defeated evil and overcame death. The powers of evil did their worst against him; but they could not overcome him. He held fast to the end and he died saying: "It has been accomplished." "He died unto sin"; the destructive force of evil is henceforth a broken and defeated army. God, wrote St. Paul, had made a spectacle of the vanquished "principality and powers" leading them captive in Christ's triumphal train (Col. 1, 15).

Even in the midst of ruin and disaster love and holiness remain invincible. God is at work in the human situation "reconciling the world to himself" with the gift of pardon, healing, and renewal. His goodness has the final word. This is what is ultimate in the nature of things. There is the ground of Christian hope and confidence.
