Pensions, Health Services Charges Seen Not Too Heavy

MONTREAL (CP) — Economist Clarence L. Barber of McGill University argued Tuesday that even if the proposed plans for pensions and health services are combined "there is in my view no reason to fear that the result will be a tax load which the economy is unable to bear." He told the annual conference of the Canadian Tax Foundation that gradual implementation of the wide-ranging health services recommended by the Hall royal commission would involve "much smaller tax increases than most people anticipate."

Professor Barber also contended that the contributions required to finance the proposed Canada Pensions Plan "should not have any serious effects on incentives or on the competitive position of Canadian industry." However, these views were not accepted by another member of a conference panel, Montreal's Douglas of Montreal, former director of the tax foundation and now head of the Canadian office of the National Industrial Conference Board.

Stressing that his views were his own and not those of the foundation, Mr. Douglas said government assurances that the pension plan is realistically geared to the growth of the economy and well within its capacity are not shared by the business community.

He contended that the economic effects of the pension plan have been "rather pushed down" by the government.

He quoted the government's white paper as saying that contributions to the pension plan would increase labor costs by two per cent in 1966, compared with wage increases averaging four to five per cent in the last decade.

Mr. Douglas said this is one way of saying that Canada's industrial costs "can stand a little more taxation."

Later, Mr. Douglas told reporters he thinks the Canadian people, looking at the plan from the standpoint of what they will pay into and get out of it, are prepared to pay the cost, in that sense the country could "afford" the plan.

However, he argued that economic growth should come first. Canada was facing huge additions to the labor force. A higher growth rate was imperative.

He was needed to cut costs, encourage investment and reduce the whole tax burden on the economy.

HOPEFUL OF GUSHIER BECKLAND, England (CP)—An American oil company has applied for permission to drill for oil near this West Sussex community. A spokesman for the local county council said the project could prove to be a "great boon" to the area and help offset unemployment.

REPLIES GALORE SEVENOAKS, England (CP)—The mailman for Dardford in this Kent town has to make special deliveries to the home of 17-year-old Elaine Jones. She wrote to a New York newspaper asking for a postcard interested in the Beatles and has had more than 4,000 replies.
