LOSING TO WIN.

A Story of Honor and Love.

BY A. MAYNARD BARBOUR.

her father was ill, and Mr. Sanford had brought him home, but when Mr. Sanford stepped from the carriage alone, and turned toward the house, she felt that something terrible had happened, and with an awful, indefinable dread, she hastened to meet him.

"Mr. Sanford," she exclaimed, "what has happened? Why is not papa with you?"

Mr. Sanford was an old friend of the family, and loved Marion almost like a daughter, and now, as he took her hand, Marion could see his face quivering with emotion, and for a moment he seemed unable to speak.

"What is the matter?" she asked wildly; "what has happened to papa?"

"My dear child," said Mr. Sanford, in trembling tones, "can you be very brave?"

"I will try," she answered firmly; "but tell me first, papa is not dead, is he?"

"No, he is living."

"But where is he?" she asked.

"Marion," he answered sadly, "we do not know. Here is a letter for you from him; let us go into the house, and after you have read the letter I will tell you what we know, and may God help you, my child!"

Scarcely knowing where she was, Marion accompanied Mr. Sanford into her father's library, and, seating herself at his great writing table, proceeded to open her letter. Her hands trembled, and the writing looked strange, like, and yet unlike, her father's, and the characters seemed to swim before her eyes. With a great effort she calmed herself, and read the following letter:—

"My dear Marion—When you read this I will be far away, and each moment will increase the distance between us, for I have brought disgrace and sorrow upon you—my child whom I always thought to shield from every sorrow—and I am not brave enough to stay and face the evil I have done, and witness your suffering, neither am I so cowardly as to add to my other sins that of suicide.

"I am ruined myself, and, worse than that, I have brought ruin upon thousands of others. I have invested the money of the bank in speculation, and have lost everything. About a year ago I became interested in some investments that promised well, and I took money from the bank, intending to replace it. But instead of replacing it, I was obliged to take more and more. It is the old story of failure, worse and worse, until to-day the whole scheme collapsed, leaving me with ruin and the crime of embezzlement staring me in the face.

"To-night there is a meeting of the directors; I cannot meet them. I have written them, confessing everything, and if it is ever in my power to make complete or partial restitution, I will do it. What little I still possess will go into their hands, my house in Irvington, and other property, and you, my child, will be left with nothing but the old home at Riverside. Thank God, that is yours; no one can take that from you.

"And now I am going forth into the world, no one knows where. Do not seek me or mourn for me, but, if you can, forgive and sometimes pray for

"Your erring father,
"JOHN M. BAINBRIDGE."

When Marion had finished reading the letter she did not faint or cry; she sat for a few moments like one stunned. Finally she roused herself, and said to Mr. Sanford, who was pacing the room:—

"What were you going to tell me? What do you know about this?"

As kindly as possible he told her what had occurred at the bank that evening. The board met, but Mr. Bainbridge was not there. After waiting for him a few moments, they had taken up the business on hand, and not until some of the books were needed, and the assistant cashier was sent for them to the safe where Mr. Bainbridge kept them, did they discover that anything was wrong. The safe was unlocked, and, on opening it, they found two letters from Mr. Bainbridge, one addressed to themselves, the other to his daughter. In his letter to the directors he had made a full confession, and even gave a complete statement of the amounts of money taken at different times. The last, and by far the largest amount, had been taken within the last month, and more than three-fourths of the whole amount within the last six months. It seemed incredible that such amounts could have been withdrawn without arousing suspicion, but the bank had implicit confidence in Mr. Bainbridge, and he had managed the affair very shrewdly. It was a terrible blow to the directors, for the bank was crippled, and they knew that the morrow would find their doors closed. What made it still worse, a large percentage of the funds was composed of the savings of hard-working people in the Irvington factories, and on the morrow many of them would find themselves penniless.

Upon examination of Mr. Bainbridge's private office, his watch and jewelry, and even the suit of clothes he had worn that day, were found, so he had evidently left the bank after dusk, in some sort of disguise.

Some of the directors sobbed like children, as they realized the ruin, and thought of what the next day must bring. To Mr. Sanford, the oldest man among them, and the one most intimately associated with Mr. Bainbridge and his daughter, was assigned the painful task of breaking the news to Marion.

As gently and as briefly as possible he had told her the sad story, but he was astonished at her composure. She had recovered from the first effect of the blow; her mind was clear and active, and she calmly asked for details, and seemed to wish to thoroughly understand the whole situation.

When at last the painful interview was at an end, Mr. Sanford begged Marion to allow him to be of some assistance to her.

"Will you not let me bring Mrs. Sanford over to spend the night with you?" he asked.

"I thank you, Mr. Sanford," she replied, "for your kindness and consideration, but it would not be best. I prefer to be alone that I may think clearly, and be able to make some plan for the future. For the present I know of no way in which you can assist me, but I will probably call upon you to-morrow."

"As you think best, my dear Marion; but get all the rest you possibly can to-night, and to-morrow if there is any way in which I can serve you, command me."

Marion thanked him, and, after bidding her good night, Mr. Sanford entered his carriage and drove rapidly away, and she was left alone; and to Marion it was a great relief to be alone, free from the restaint imposed by the presence of one, who, though a friend, was yet outside of the sacred home circle; a relief no longer to be obliged to listen to words of pity, spoken in kindness, yet which stung to the quick the sensitive nature of Marion, who never before had need of pity.

Ringing the bell for the housekeeper, she calmly gave the usual instructions for the servants, merely stating that her father had gone away and would not return that night; then she retired to her own room, but not to rest.

Throwing herself upon her knees beside a low couch, she buried her face in her hands, while her slender frame shook in tearless agony. Thoughts of her father came crowding into her mind. She seemed to see him—heretofore so honored and beloved—now an outcast, a fugitive, fleeing no one knew whither, and her first prayer was one for divine pity and mercy for him, and she sought grace and strength for herself. She shuddered as she thought of the disgrace when all this would be made public, and then she partially forgot her own sorrow in the thought of the suffering of the poor people who had lost their all. She remembered some of them, too old and feeble to work, with their little sums put by for the "rainy day," of which they were as proud as the rich man of his millions, and now—they would starve! She sprang to her feet and walked the room in anguish. A thought that had flashed into her mind while Mr. Sanford was talking forced itself upon her now, and developed into a definite plan—the only plan she could think of—but it cost a bitter struggle. For hours she paced the room; then she grew calmer, and, going to one of the broad windows, looked out on the scene before her. She saw in the soft, bright moonlight a picture fairer and lovelier than any art gallery can produce; sleeping flowers, with the elms drooping tenderly above them; the winding river, shimmering in the moonlight; the peaceful meadows, dotted with slumbering cattle; the distant fields, yellow with their ungarnered gold.

"It is so beautiful," she murmured, "and only a few hours ago I said I did not know what I would not sacrifice rather than lose it! I know now; I will not sacrifice honor, or the lives of those poor people."

Sinking on a couch beside the window in utter exhaustion, the tears came to her relief, and she sobbed herself to sleep like a tired child.

Marion awoke the next morning with a strange sense of oppression and weight, and as she recalled the events of the preceding day it seemed as if life were being crushed out of her; but she knew that the only relief was in action, and at once began making preparations for carrying out her decision formed in the night.

She ordered an early breakfast, and gave instructions for the coachman to have the carriage ready at once. As she came down to the breakfast room, in dark street dress, she read in the pitying yet curious glances of the servants that all was known to them. Mr. Sanford's coachman the night before had given them all the information which he possessed; and in addition the morning paper, that purveyor of gossip and scandal, had served up the whole affair in the most elaborate manner, with startling headlines, and the most minute details even to the color of the suit of clothes in which Mr. Bainbridge was supposed to have made his escape, as an average reporter, when the facts are wanting, can readily supply the deficiency from his own imagination. Two or three of these vultures of society were already hovering around Riverside, requesting "an interview with Miss Bainbridge," but Marion calmly declined to meet any of them, and, taking her carriage, ordered the coachman to drive her to Irvington, to the home of her atorney, Mr. Wyman, as it was yet too early to find him in his office.

Early as it was, Marion noticed the excitement prevailing everywhere. Already the humbler depositors of the bank were pouring into Irvington from every direction, and groups of forlorn, tired-looking women, surrounded by unkempt children, talking together, with pale, frightened faces, were seen in the little hamlets passed, and the sight made Marion the more firm in carrying out her resolution. The experience of the last few hours had changed Marion from joyous-hearted girlhood to thoughtful womanhood. Suffering had added a new dignity to her manner, and brought a new expression to the beautiful brown eyes. In her former freedom from sorrow, she had looked on the sorrows of others with a gentle pity; but now her soul looked out on suffering humanity with a new and tender sympathy, for she had suffered herself.

She found Mr. Wyman in his library, and briefly and unfalteringly stated the errand upon which she had come. The old lawyer had been a personal friend of the Vaughns, and was greatly attached to Marion, and he protested bitterly against her decision. It was of no use, however, and at last he consented to accompany her, and the coachman was directed to drive to his office.

"I don't like this, Marion," said the old gentleman; "you are in no way responsible for this, in no way connected with it; there is no reason for your making this sacrifice, and the law would never demand it."

"No," replied Marion, calmly, "there is no legal obligation, but there is something higher and more binding—a moral obligation. Mr. Wyman, would it be right for all these poor people to suffer so terribly through my father's error—his mistake—and I, his own daughter, live in luxury? Am I not the one to atone for this wrong? To me it will mean deprivation only: to them, starvation. There is no danger that I shall starve, and I shall be far less miserable than to be living here in wealth, and witnessing the suffering around me; that I could never do."

The carriage waited long at Mr. Wyman's office, and when at last Marion reappeared, and, accompanied by Mr. Wyman, drove in the direction of the bank, she was no longer the owner of Riverside, as she carried with her an assignment of all the property, both real and personal, in favor of those whom her father had robbed.

SKIN DISEASES!

One Remedy Which has Never Failed—Tried and Tested Ointment.

Because other alleged remedies for piles, scrofula, eczematic eruptions, scald head, chafing, black heads, salt rheum and skin diseases generally have proved useless, don't condemn Dr. Chase's Ointment. It has never been known to fail. For instance, Nelson Simmons, Meyersburg, Ont., writes:

"I used Dr. Chase's Ointment for Itching Piles, and can recommend it highly. Since using it I have had perfect freedom from the disease."

Peter Vanallen, L'Amable, Que., had the eczema for three years. He tried three doctors, but received no benefit. One box of Dr. Chase's Ointment and three boxes of Dr. Chase's Pills cured him completely. Large scales covered his legs and body, but the Ointment soon removed them. He will swear to these facts.

Chase's Ointment may be had from any dealer or from the manufacturers Edmanson, Bates & Co., 45 Lombard street, Toronto. Price 60 cents.

Mother's greatest remedy for coughs, colds, bronchcial and lung affections is Dr. Chase's Syrup of Linseed and Turpentine. The medicinal taste is wholly disguised making it pleasant to take. Large bottle 25 cents.

A NEW CLUB.

Name Suggested for a New Social Organization in London.

LONDON (Special) June 22—It has been facetiously suggested that a new social club in process of organization in this city should be entitled "The Dodd's Kidney Pill Club," as the present members are all enthusiastic advocates of that remedy, and in common with many other citizens declare that in all cases of kidney trouble no other agent has been found so completely effective. Most Londoners have at their fingers ends the particulars of the many marvellous cures through the use of this specific. In every drugstore in the city the medicine is kept in large quantities and warmly recommended.

REMARKABLE HYBRID BERRIES.

Cross Fertilization of Strawberries, Raspberries and Blackberries.

A nurseryman representing a leading Eastern firm was in the city yesterday, and last evening he showed a reporter some remarkable hybrid berries which he is placing on the market, and which promise to eclipse the strawberry, the raspberry and the blackberry as table favorites.

The first of these that may be mentioned is the strawberry raspberry, which is said to be a hybrid between a strawberry and a raspberry. The berry, while maintaining the shape and general appearance of a strawberry, has globules or dupes like the raspberry. It thrives on a spreading, low-growing bush, producing its fruit on branches which cluster in three and four at the ends of the stems. In form and appearance, it might be said, the fruit is about as good a combination of a strawberry and red raspberry as one could well imagine. It is said to come from Japan, and to be entirely hardy. Perhaps the most remarkable hybrid shown was what was called the "Golden Mayberry." It is principally so called because it ripens about May 1, being the earliest berry known. The berries are of a golden straw color, as large as the Cuthbert, and they ripen near New York as early as the date named. The bushes are distinct from all others, growing like trees from 6 to 8 feet high, with spreading tops. Along the branches are large, white, well-shaped blossoms, which remain pendant. The history of the variety is as follows: Ten years ago a collector from this country was sent to Japan to hunt up the best wild raspberries, blackberries and strawberries that could be found. Several curious species were returned next season, among them being a red and also a dingy yellow unproductive variety of Rubus palmatus. One of the plants, though bearing only a few worthless, tasteless, dingy berries, was selected on account of its unusual earliness, to cross with the Cuthbert and other well known raspberries. Among the seedlings raised from this plant was the Golden Mayberry, which, while showing no evidences of the cross with the Cuthbert, probably has affected the new variety. Should the new variety prove hardy, it is likely it will become popular, not only because it is so early, but because the berry is unlike any other, with a possible exception of the yellow raspberry.

A third hybid shown was that called the Logan berry, supposed to be a cross between the blackberry and the red raspberry. The berries are large, fully as large as the largest blackberries, which they resemble in form and structure, but they are a deep reddish-maroon in color. The canes are of strong, vigorous growth with an abundance of dark green foliage, resembling that of the blackberry more than the raspberry. They are semi-trailing in habit; are without the large sharp thorns of the blackberry, but with numerous fine red spines like those upon red raspberries.

The hybridization is supposed to be carried on by the bee, and the bushes and vines are so arranged that the results may be detected with the nearest approach to certainty. This opens a somewhat new field for cross-fertilization, and no doubt the results will be watched with no little interest. Though the berries named have not been introduced into this section yet, as they are becoming better known in New York it is more than likely they will find their way this far west before any great length of time.—Rochester Democrat.

SUPERPHOSPHATES AND CHEMICALS.

Sole Agents for P. E. Island for THE BRADLEY FERTILIZER CO., the largest concern of the kind in the world. We have a large stock, on hand and to arrive, at these well known MANURES, and can refer purchasers to many of our very best farmers who have been using them for years with very gratifying results.

We can also supply the same goods (Ground Slag) as offered by our would-be competitors as "English Fertilizer" at at least 20 per cent less price than they now ask for it, but at the same time we would not advise its use, believing that THE GENUINE ENGLISH MANURES AS SOLD ONLY BY US are much the best value. Prices, Pamphlets, etc., on application.
