CHAPTER XVII

"I WILL SHOOT DALE!"

"Gerald's just coming," he said awkwardly. "I think he'll be all right—but he may want rather careful handling."

"Thank you, Mr. James."

"But where's Janet?"

"She said she would prefer to dine at home after all," said Sheila deliberately.

"I see. But—you know—I hardly like to leave you alone with Gerald in his present state of mind."

Sheila did not reply, for Gerald walked in at that moment, rather dishevelled and wide-eyed.

"I'll have dinner brought in," she said.

"Do you think I want to eat?" snarled Gerald.

"I'm sure you want a drink, Gerald."

"And how right you are!"

He went to the sideboard, and splashed whisky into a tumbler.

"I'd be careful of whisky on an empty stomach, if I were you," put in Patrick James.

Gerald rounded on him.

"I'm grateful to you for bringing me back," he said, "but do leave me alone now! I've got some thinking to do."

"What about Gerry?"

"What do you think?" snapped Gerald. "That blighter Wu, of course!"

"If that's all," retorted Sheila, you needn't bother yourself any more, because Leslie's back."

Gerald who flung himself into a chair, started up out of the same as if propelled by a spring.

"Back, is he? Where is he?"

"Gone to pay Wu a visit."

"Ah," said Patrick James with satisfaction, "that's what I'd have expected of him."

Gerald disregarded the interruption.

"When will he be back?" he demanded.

"He said—in the morning," said Sheila indifferently.

"Capital," said Gerald. "The missionary, who, unlike Sheila, did not perceive the underlying irony in Gerald's voice. "You can go off to bed with an easy mind, Gerald, and have a good sleep."

"Oh can I? You think so?"

"Of course. I've complete confidence in Leslie. He'll settle things his way easily enough."

"Quite," said Gerald emphatically; and added, "And then I'll settle them mine!"

"What on earth do you mean?"

Gerald Havelock splashed out another drink for himself and spoke over the rim of the tumbler. He spoke a little thickly, between the effects of raw spirit and hardly-repressed emotion:

"I know you think I'm just a blithering young incompetent fool! Well, I may be all that as an agent-in-charge. But I'm competent enough to do as I once said. The moment Leslie Dale put his face inside this house again, I'll shoot him like a dog!"

"You're done up and over excited," said James soothingly. "You'll feel differently in the morning, after some sleep."

Gerald laughed shrilly.

"So you don't believe it?" he stammered. "You think I'm going to sleep. I'm waiting up for him!"

And he pulled from his pocket the pistol with which he had threatened Wu earlier in the evening.

TWO AND A PISTOL

Patrick James flung out an authoritative hand. "Don't talk melodramatic nonsense!" he said. "Give me that pistol, Gerald!"

"You mind your own business!"

"Gerald!" protested Sheila.

"This has gone far enough," said the missionary angrily.

"I quite agree," said Gerald, speaking more calmly. "I don't want to hurt you, padre, if only for your wife's sake. She's always been pretty decent to me. But you get along and lock after her, or I may have to rehearse on your carcass!"

He levelled the pistol straight at Patrick James's chest. Sheila saw the missionary's eyes glow, and his big fist clenched. But, for once, whether owing to an influx of unexpected courage, alcohol or otherwise, Gerald Havelock seemed to know his own mind. His finger tightened on the trigger, and Sheila uttered a little scream.

"Get along, padre! Quick march!"

"Please go," Mr. James, said Sheila urgently. "This isn't your responsibility, you know. I shall be quite all right."

"Get out!" Gerald interrupted savagely.

Patrick James shrugged his shoulders. There was no question of his being afraid. He was one of those fortunate men, whose record was such that no one could conceivably question his courage. But, though his instinct might rebel at the thought of leaving Sheila Havelock alone with Gerald as he was, every atom of commonsense revolted at the absurdity of getting himself shot by a drunken boy in a fit of self-pity. There was Janet, and his Mission to be thought of.

He bowed slightly to Sheila, and

2 Bushels of Ripe TOMATOES from ONE VINE

2 or 3 vines will produce enough tomatoes for the average family.

THE NEW CLIMBER

TOMATO-GRO

TOMATO rapidly grows to a height of 10 to 12 feet—often as high as 16 to 20 feet. Grow on trellis, on side of house, barn or anywhere. Can be grown as a bush in garden. Beautiful, large, crimson, solid, heavy fruit of best quality. The most productive of all tomatoes.

The many friends of the junior children the masters Daniel Douglass, Gordon Vessey and little walked slowly out. Gerald watched him go, and grinned unpleasantly. He had savoured victory over a stronger personality, and the novelty of the sensation was sweet in his nostrils. He followed the missionary out on to the veranda, and watched him climb down the steps. Then he re-entered the room where his wife was standing with one arm held tightly across her breasts, her eyes very wide open, her lips tightly shut.

Almost as if sleep-walking, in his complete disregard of her, Gerald proceeded to shut the french windows, closing and barring the heavy bullet-proof wooden shutters. With the same uncanny deliberation he then locked the three doors leading respectively to the two bedrooms and the servants' quarters, pushed one of the long chairs out into the middle of the room and a second with its back against the door of his own bedroom.

"Now Sheila," he said, "go and sit down in that chair!"
