Let's Talk It Over

by "d"

A deadly poison when taken in large quantities is quite often a beneficial medicine if taken in prescribed small quantities. This may be the answer to the "frills and furbelows" problem in our modern schools. Might it not be that they are beneficial when used with discretion, but harmful if too much time that should be given to the conventional subjects, is devoted to them. It has been demonstrated that if a man works an hour and has a break of five or ten minutes, he will often do more work than if he kept working all day without a break. But if he should work a half hour and rest a half hour that would be carrying the idea to an undesirable extreme.

• • •

The teaching of music, art, domestic science, manual training, etc., all invaluable in themselves, also possess a recreational value that cannot be ignored. Pupils do not require a full 25 hours per week of concentrated unremitting study of English, mathematics, foreign languages, sciences, etc. If they take, say three hours, out of their weekly program for the "frills" they will be the better refreshed for their other work. At the very least, it can be compared to the frills on a young girl's dress which are of little practical value, but pretty important just the same. But the educational "frills" sometimes do start pupils on worthwhile careers. They also teach skills that come in handy in everyday living.

• • •

It is possible in the United States, and in some parts of Canada, these "frills" are being carried too far. This is scarcely true of Prince Edward Island. The fact that our cautious feet sometimes lag a little in the march of progress may be a good thing in this regard. We are not likely to be near the van in any madcap untried schemes. Before we proceed too far, the manifest absurdities will have been corrected, and the trend will have been reversed. If our modern pupils are not English students, it is not because the "frills" have usurped their time, for you will find this same weakness in English in localities where there is no sign of these modern additions to the curriculum. The reason for poor English students stems, we think, from other causes, which we would like to discuss in a subsequent column.

Alexander Becomes Canadian Director

MONTREAL (CP)—Britain now is better prepared to meet an attack from an aggressor than at any other time in her history, Earl Alexander of Tunis said Thursday night.

In a relaxed, amiable mood the former governor-general of Canada met newspaper men in his hotel suite.

He said British defences have improved vastly in recent years and she now possesses potent powers of retaliation as well as a powerful fighter defence and effective radar system.

Lord Alexander, who retired last autumn as British defence minister, arrived in Montreal Wednesday by air to be present for his appointment as a director of Aluminium, Ltd., at the company's annual meeting.
