The Good Time Coming.

Englishmen as a rule are proud of the manner in which railroads in the British Isles are constructed. A gentleman who was abroad recently overheard a remark which pleased him very much. An American girl was discussing with a nobleman the differences between the railroad systems. The Englishman said that the roadbeds of English railroads were much superior to those of the different American systems and would last the English until eternity.

The Yankee girl, however, was quick to make a reply, and she said, "As we Americans expect to wear wings there is no necessity of building railroads to last forever."—Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph.
